University students should base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field.

There are ~~the~~ main groups of people: the ones who think it is better to choose your passion as a ~~job~~ ^{field of study} and the ones who consider job prospects to be the main criteria. ~~I am the part of~~ I am the part of the second group. Why? Because let's be honest, most of the school graduates don't have a defined passion to pursue. The ones that do, go on, do it. But the substantial part of people is only aware of the fields of study they absolutely would not enroll in. Their job is to pick five to ten majors they would not mind to take ~~base the rest of the~~ and pick one of these, based on ~~job~~ the availability of jobs in that field.

My main argument is that the difference in satisfaction of students between majors they like and majors they like a little bit less is not big enough to base your choice on that. Meanwhile, there is a difference ^{in satisfaction} between a person who easily finds a job in their field and the person who struggles to do so. In ~~market~~, a job market without available places the salary is lower as well. That can easily reduce your quality of life.

~~Someone might say that I consider~~ Of course, you should pick ^{the} field that you like, but you should consider job availability as well. And you should not base your choice only on that, because the job that you don't like will burn you out easily.

In conclusion, both criteria are important, but I ^{recommend} ~~advise~~ young people to look into job prospects more.

The choice of a field of study is an important step towards students future career. Sometimes students base their choice only on the availability of jobs in a particular field. In my opinion, this factor, undoubtedly, plays a significant role, and teenagers should make a decision based on the availability of jobs. To support my point of view I will provide a couple of arguments.

First of all, after graduation from university students who have chosen a field of study where it is difficult to get a job may eventually work in absolutely different field, which does not correspond their profession. Moreover, I am convinced that some students might become unemployed due to the lack of jobs places.

Secondly, ~~students~~ teenagers who do not take the availability of jobs into consideration probably just waste their time studying at university, since they are unlikely to get a job that they are qualified for. Thus, it seems quite useless to ~~apply to~~ study in university and then ~~to~~ not get an appropriate job.

Nevertheless, there are reasons that can challenge my position. For instance, if students are not interested in some fields of study it will ~~be~~ not be reasonable to try to change their minds.

In conclusion I would like to admit that I firmly believe that job availability is still very important in choosing future fields of study and, in my opinion, an opportunity of getting a good job depends on it.

Зад. 2. Topic №1

Nowadays the problem of choosing an occupation is always discussed between university students. Some of them claim that students should base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field. Personally, I agree with this position, and I want to explain why I think so.

First of all, all the students, ^{of course,} want to have a high salary and to be rich. The most well-paid jobs are usually those, which the society requires. If it needs, for example, IT specialists, there will be a lot of vacancies in this field. And if there is a high demand on a particular job from the side of society, the wage for such workers will also be at a high level. That is why I am convinced that students should choose their field of study ^{of course,} basing on availability of jobs in that field.

Secondly, the availability of jobs in different ^{fields} ~~spheres~~ indicate which spheres of ~~society's~~ life of the society will be developing in the future. For example, if there ~~are~~ ^{many} a lot of vacancies of an engineer, it means that engineering is going to be developed in this country. And if a student chooses such a job, he will be very useful for the whole society, producing new types of energy sources, for instance. That is the reason why students should choose their academic subject according to availability of jobs that include this subject.

To conclude ^{that}

To conclude, I totally agree the availability of jobs in a particular field should be one of the most important criteria when choosing a field of study in university. Students should base on this University years are the best years of your life, as they say. What they do not mention is how hard it can be for a person fresh out of college to get the job they want. In our fast-paced world more and more people are striving for the same positions, and due to competition ^{many} ~~some of~~ them are left jobless. That's why I agree with the claim and believe that the solution to the problem is basing the choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field.

One of the primary challenges involved in getting a job is finding a vacant position. This happens due to trends. These days lots of people tend to get a degree in marketing or administration, and it's hard for them to find a job, as ~~these~~ ^{now} managers aren't in high demand ~~currently~~. It's best to get acquainted with the ^{current} trends ~~at the work market~~ first and choose a degree that isn't popular amongst students yet is needed at the work market. The availability of jobs in a developing field won't change drastically during university years, that's why it's sensible to ^{choose} ~~such~~ the field in high school.

What's more, the availability of jobs in a specific field shows how much employers are willing to pay their workers. In Russia the salaries of workers in remote areas are higher than of those who have a 9 to 5 job ⁱⁿ the office. It's understandable that if many people have the same degree the employers don't feel the pressure of giving workers a raise. If someone ~~dec~~ leaves the company, it's easy to find a replacement.

Summing up, I'd like to say it's crucial ~~to~~ for students to base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field if they want a successful career. Students ~~also~~ should begin to think about the perspectives of their chosen career path even before applying to university.

I believe the idea that end justifies the means is a popular one. And it is easy to see the appeal: it's nice to imagine that if the end result is achieved, the scale of harm ~~it~~ it caused can be forgotten. And yet, I wish to challenge this notion.

Firstly, I am convinced that great things can be ^{gained} ~~achieved~~ with empathy in mind. Considering the well-being of others, while could slow down the process of ⁿinnovation, is undeniably more moral and ethical.

Secondly, ~~the~~ the strategy of ~~the~~ ~~justified~~ reaching the goal by any means necessary might cause more harm than good and consequently be detrimental to our planet and society. It renders the positive benefits of the achieved aim irrelevant, as ~~its destruction was~~ it caused more suffering ^{than} ~~than~~ ^e alleviated it.

Finally, it has been scientifically proven that sometimes less ~~force~~ forceful approach ends up being more effective. Rarely are there situations when ~~a~~ cruel means will yield ~~a~~ the desirable result, while diplomacy oftentimes has a much better chance at success.

Of course, some might argue that aggressive approach ^{has} gifted us plenty of invaluable innovations. ^{and thus it is crucial for our society.} However, I disagree. I strongly believe the identical results ^{could} ~~can~~ have been achieved through less invasive means, albeit after a longer period of time. ~~And~~ Furthermore, I am convinced that we cannot call ourselves human if we forsake our duty to be empathetic and kind.

All in all, I am sure ^{that} there are strong reasons to reconsider ~~the~~ opting for this strategy. Other ways at achieving the same or similar results ~~might be~~ are more moral and sometimes even more effective.

Passion versus Success

Over the recent years the choice of a career for university students has been narrowing down due to the amount of positions shrinking with every graduation. Some people still believe that this decision should side with preference while others think the opposite way. Personally, I think that the choice of career is not influenced by anything but just yourself.

With the ~~options~~ ~~roads~~ options fading away it may be incredibly difficult to blaze a trail for yourself. I still side with choosing a career on your own, the first reason being the fact that you dedicate your life to it. People tend to rush to get in the first wagon that they see available. But when people turn twenty they just start off their independent life. It is crucial that you stay flexible and take it easy.

Viewing it from the perspective of general success people share their career path on the internet, seeing their wages and a plethora of quality of life possibilities it may be quite tempting to attempt to build something similar. However, what all people fail to realize that everyone's career paths differ and everybody experience success in their own way. So instead of taking the trodden path of grass it is better to experiment and find something for yourself.

To cut the long story short, I believe that the career choice is a question of passion and definitely not success. Exchanging something that you love for just a mere paycheck, it just solidifies your life as a gloomy path of despair, since you dedicate most of your life to your job. No matter how tempting money can be your mental health will always be the main priority.

It is often said that if a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable. I agree with this statement, as there is nothing more important than the dream you are chasing. If you aren't ready to fight for the aim you yearn so much, then comes the doubt. "Is it all worth it in the end?" and a plethora of other questions floods your mind. Many people cower because of the sheer pressure, but if you know that the goal you have set is what your heart desires, then any method used to reach ~~the~~ it are justifiable.

Of course, the first example of people who were ready to do anything that gave up in the end is Rodion Raskolnikov from "Crime and punishment" by Dostoyevski. Trying to prove himself that he is above the law, one of the elites, he failed. Personally, I think that he just wasn't ready. One of the requirements of reaching the goal you aim for, is iron will. But Rodion's heart swayed and he ended up ~~scrapping~~ with nothing. You also need motivation to achieve the aim you set. And the prime example would be "Will to live" by Jack London. The main character's strive to survive pushes him forward towards his dream. He was ready to do anything even taking on a wolf, which he did. This is the perfect illustration of why any means are justifiable to achieve the aim.

In conclusion, I would like to stress the paramount importance of goals in life. Without a goal, one loses sight of future and becomes emotionally numb. Hence this is why I believe that everything is justifiable when pursuing an aim.

Education plays a crucial role in shaping the future of children, and parents are essential partners in this process. The idea that all parents should be required to volunteer their time in their children's schools is a proposition that deserves serious consideration. By mandating parental involvement, we not only enhance the educational experience for students but also strengthen the school community.

First and foremost, parental volunteering fosters a positive school environment. When parents actively participate in school activities, they contribute to a sense of belonging and community among students, teachers and families. This involvement can lead to improved student behavior, increased attendance, and higher academic performance. Research has shown that children whose parents are engaged in their education tend to have better outcomes. When parents assist in classrooms, organize events, or help with fundraising, they bridge the gap between home and school, creating a support network that benefits everyone involved.

Moreover, requiring parental involvement can help alleviate the burdens faced by teachers and school staff. Many educators often struggle with large class sizes and limited resources. By having parents volunteer, schools can tap into a diverse pool of skills and expertise that can enhance learning opportunities and create a richer educational experience. For instance, parents with backgrounds in art, science, or technology can provide specialized support, facilitating hands-on learning and mentorship for students.

In conclusion, mandating parent involvement in schools is a beneficial policy that yields positive outcomes for students and educators alike. It fosters a sense of community and provides essential support to teachers. A collaborative approach to education is vital for the holistic development of children, and parental involvement is a key element of that partnership.

Many people are of the opinion that the attempts taken to achieve a worthy goal can be justified no matter what. Opinions differ, however, personally, I strongly disagree with such a statement.

The question whether the goal is worth it could be understood and accepted by people to a different extent. It highly depends on the person's moral principles and determines the decisions being made by people in order to achieve their goals. The attempt to attain the goal might not always follow the morality and can cause harm to others or even result to unpredictable consequences.

Some actions require injuring or offending others as a means of reaching something that oneself thinks is worthy. I am of the opinion that committing crimes just to achieve a goal is unacceptable and under no circumstances should be justified.

Moreover, the mindset which proclaims that anything a person does to attain their dream is justifiable seems selfish to me. The purposes which some actions are being done for do not always take other people's feelings, comfort or safety into account, which is obviously an individualistic trait. Some people are prone to lying, stealing, tricking others as means of getting what they crave, which often makes them forget about others. This type of people is quite common nowadays, as they don't notice anything surrounding them besides their goals.

In conclusion I'd like to say that over-enthusiastic and self-centered individuals tend to cause disruption to society in order to achieve something and these actions cannot be justified.

The history of human progress is replete with examples of accidental discoveries that transformed the world. From penicillin to microwave ovens, many groundbreaking inventions emerged while pursuing entirely different goals. This phenomenon highlights the ~~an~~ unpredictable nature of innovation and the value of maintaining an open mind during scientific exploration.

Firstly, accidental discoveries or creations often stem from the curiosity and adaptability of research. For instance, Alexander Fleming discovered penicillin, the first antibiotic, when he noticed that a mold contaminating his petri dish killed bacteria around it. This discovery revolutionized ~~a~~ medicine and saved millions of lives, even though Fleming's original intent was unrelated to antibiotics. Such examples emphasize how chance favors prepared and observant minds, enabling unexpected break through.

Secondly, pursuing one question can lead to insights that transcend its original scope. This is particularly evident in fundamental sciences. For example while experimenting with cathode ray tubes, Wilhelm Röntgen accidentally discovered X-Rays. This invention not only transformed medicine diagnostics, but also opened new avenues in physics and engineering. These instances underscore the interconnectedness of knowledges, where progress in one field often catalyze advancements in others. However, not all accidental discoveries occur in controlled environments; sometimes they are dismissed due to skepticism or lack of immediate utility. The prime example is the discovery of Teflon, a material initially seen as an industrial curiosity but later found widespread applications in non-stick cookware. These fostering environments that encourage exploration and the application of unexpected findings

In conclusion, while delibered effort and strustured researches are essential for innovetion, many important discoveries are indeed accidental.

Some people think that, if a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable. Personally, I strongly disagree with this view for a bunch of reasons.

First and foremost, there should be some moral supressants to your actions. Indeed, a particular goal might seem sacrifice-worthy, but it does not mean you should abandon your moral principles. To add to this, some ways of going for your dream may be inimical to your health. Therefore, risking both your mental and physical health does not worth achieving some temporary goal. Besides, you can face the aftermath^{later} - an avalanche of health issues that appear in the long-term. Finally, you should not give up your life for a goal completely. Everyday happiness is just as vital as big dreams, and cherishing every moment of your life is significant.

To prove my point, I can provide an example from literature. In a Russian novel that I am familiar with, the main character has a life-long dream - his own house that has a garden with kopehnik in it. He tries to attain this dream ~~throughout~~ throughout his whole life, and it influences his decisions. Eventually, he succeeds in achieving his dream, but it results in some very disappointing consequences. The main ~~hero~~ character is left ~~down~~ alone without any friends or family ^{beside} ~~near~~ him. ^{And though} He now has a decent house with his dream garden, ~~but~~ his life is devoid of happiness. This example proves that risking everything for a dream does not always lead to you being content with your life.

In conclusion, I want to add that there is a ~~gray~~ ~~area~~ gray area between happiness and despair when it comes to taking some huge risks and sacrificing everything for a goal.

What occupation to choose? In what field of study do I want to get my further education? These questions are very relevant to every student in the world. In my opinion, university students do not always have to base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field due to several reasons. Firstly, your future profession is something that will be connected with you for the rest of your life. But as soon as time passes, the availability of jobs in that field can change crucially. So, in my opinion, there is no need to choose your field of study according to the current economic situation.

Secondly, you should choose the field of study that interests you the most and where you will have the best conditions for subsequent growing, ~~an~~ improving and developing. ~~Thus~~ Therefore, if you have a real passion for this occupation, you will be able to become a real professional. ~~and~~ ^{you} will get a well-paid job even if the situation on the stock is not very good.

In addition, I would like to say that it is ~~up~~ the student who makes the choice, and only he/she will be able to make the right decision. ~~as they know~~ ^{only} As students themselves know their strong sides and preferences better than anybody else. So, they have to make this difficult choice according to their inner feelings.

To sum it up, I would like to say that the situation on the stock is an important part of choosing your future occupation. But you should always leave the last word in it to your personal feelings and willings.

There is a common misconception that any means should be employed to achieve a worthy goal. However, I am inclined to believe that ^{one can not use any method} ~~the means methods chosen used~~ ~~one phrases to achieve one's aim, even if it is worthy~~ ~~to achieve an aim should be chosen carefully and should~~ ~~to achieve a worthy aim, noble aim.~~ ~~have some boundaries.~~ to achieve a noble aim.

First of all, identifying a goal to be worthy is ~~is~~ highly subjective ~~process~~. Therefore, ^{if what may be} ~~if any means can be~~ ~~noble cause worthy cause for one person may be~~ ~~used to achieve an aim categorised as worthy, then~~ ~~horrific for another.~~ ^{considered a} noble cause for one person may be horrific for another. For example, the Nazi ~~Regis~~ regime thought it a worthy goal to create the Aryan race, using all possible means, including torture and mass killings, to achieve it. These inhuman methods caused widespread ~~the~~ widespread suffering of innocent people, simply for the benefit of ~~the~~ select few.

Moreover, the use of cruel means to achieve a goal, however worthy, undermines it. It is ~~even~~ almost impossible for the ~~final~~ outcome to make up ^{for} ~~for the suffering inflicted~~ on individuals and the tragedies that occurred along the way. For instance, Oliver Cromwell, with the initial aim to create a fair ~~and peaceful~~ Republic in Britain, used harsh means to achieve it, ^{Using his} ~~Having sole rule over Britain~~ as Lord Protector, he ^{placing} ~~placed~~ considerable restrictions on the private lives of the British people. As a result, his previously well-supported aim lost its value in the eyes of society, ultimately being unsuccessful. Thus, the methods he ~~used~~ ~~were~~ employed were not justifiable, even though the original idea may have given way to a more equal British society.

Furthermore, whilst some may argue that one should try to achieve one's ^{individual} ~~goals~~ ~~or~~ aims on the ~~le~~ without ~~boundaries~~ ^{limits} ~~limits~~ ^{think} ~~on the level of the individual, I am of the opinion~~ ~~that~~ one should maintain a sense of balance, ~~without~~ ~~working towards one's goals~~. When it comes to students preparing to get into university, for the sake of the university of their dreams, students pupils may deprive themselves of sleep ^{and} ~~and~~ sport and ~~pursuit of their~~ hobbies, using all possible means to ^{allocate} ~~allocate~~ study more, ^{allocate more time} ~~allocate more time~~ for study. Unfortunately, this is not effective in the long term and may cause more damage to the student's health than good for their academic achievement.

All in all, I believe that the means taken to attain a worthy goal should be chosen carefully to avoid harm

~~being inflicted on the innocent and to be fair,~~
~~identifying limits on ^{which} ~~what~~ ~~are~~ measures can be~~ ~~employed in a given situation. In this way, both~~
~~individuals and society can move steadily forwards~~
~~to realising their goals and for fulfilling their dreams.~~

All in all, I believe that there should be limits on which means can be used to attain a given worthy goal. In this way, both individuals and society can ~~more~~ ~~stead~~ ~~steadily~~ ~~forwards~~ ~~to~~ ~~realising~~ ~~their~~ ~~fulfilling~~ ~~their~~ ~~dreams~~. In this way, everyone can progress ~~to~~ ~~fulfil~~ ~~their~~ ~~dreams~~. in fulfilling their dreams.

Правила участия в олимпиадных состязаниях

В Олимпиаде принимают участие все желающие, не имеющие законченного среднего образования, независимо от гражданства. Взимание платы за участие в Олимпиаде не допускается.

Во время проведения соревновательного тура запрещается:

- иметь при себе средства связи, электронно-вычислительную технику, фото-, аудио и видеоаппаратуру, справочные материалы, письменные заметки и иные средства хранения и передачи информации;
- выносить из локаций и места проведения олимпиады листы бумаги для черновиков с отметкой организатора или комплекты олимпиадных заданий на бумажных и (или) электронном носителе;
- фотографировать комплекты олимпиадных заданий;
- пользоваться справочными материалами, кроме тех, которые выданы в комплекте олимпиадных заданий;
- перемещаться по месту проведения олимпиады во время проведения олимпиады без сопровождения дежурного вне локаций.
- разговаривать, пересаживаться, обмениваться любыми материалами и предметами;
- делать какие-либо пометки в бланках (листах) ответов, позволяющие идентифицировать его работу, умышленно повреждать бланки (листы) ответов, мешать другим участникам выполнять задания.

В случае нарушения порядка проведения олимпиады вы будете удалены с олимпиады.

При выполнении заданий можно использовать ручку только с синими или черными чернилами. Использование ручек с чернилами красного цвета не допускается!

Ознакомиться с результатами олимпиады вы сможете в личном кабинете участника олимпиады на сайте mu.fu.ru в разделе «Олимпиады и конкурсы», далее в разделе «Мои мероприятия». Черновики при проведении апелляции не рассматриваются.

Needless to say that opting for a specific educational path is a cornerstone moment for every ^{of persons} school graduate. Not only does the choice of a university major define ^{of future} one's field of professional expertise, but it also influences their career prospects. The question is, should students make the final decision of entering a certain university department, focusing primarily on their personal interests or should they consider the practical value of a job, its availability on the labour market?

Personally, I believe that the actual possibility to utilise professional skills is supposed to be the key factor when choosing a route of university ^{education} ~~training~~. Every student is drawn by the indisputable desire to receive recognition in their vocation, to contribute to the development of a specific organisation or a job field. In order to ^{fulfill} ~~realise~~ these ambitions, to reach professional goals university students ought to rely on the need for certain specialists in the sphere of labour, on the vacancies employers are ^{eager} ~~willing~~ to provide, and to train for these positions.

~~What about the possible and less likely~~
'Should personal preferences and love for a certain profession be neglected then?' some might inquire. Unfortunately, yes, would be my ^{person's} ~~dis-~~ ^{categorical} ~~dis-~~ ^{person's} answer. The thing is that, if a student fails to find a job offer after receiving their university ~~deg~~ diploma, they are likely to gradually lose their enthusiasm, their lust for life. ~~Without~~ Being deprived of the opportunity to realise themselves as specialists, people tend to stifle their dreams and ^{end up} ~~find themselves~~ in despair. Having a displeasing job but compensating for the lack of ^{professional} ~~job~~ satisfaction with the financial means earned it seems to be an infinitely preferable option.

All in all, ~~a~~ university ~~the~~ students ~~an~~ should be rational with their choice of a major. More often than not, it is the ~~pragmatic~~ ^{of skills} ~~prosaic~~ usability and availability of a job that are pivotal when making a decision.

Making a career decision is one of the most difficult tasks in ^a student's life especially when a person doesn't have any experience in working in different fields. There are many different aspects that should be taken into consideration while choosing a career path. To my mind, ~~availability~~ availability of jobs is not an integrative aspect of all of them and students should consider their future job depending on other things.

Firstly, students should pay attention to their preferences and interests. If job doesn't give satisfaction and ^a sense of fulfillment there is no sense in doing it. Moreover, freshmen should ~~take~~ ^{bear} in mind the conditions that occupations offer as some jobs provide hardships that not everybody ~~is~~ is ready to face with.

Secondly, it is important to think over prospects and possibilities ^{that can help you} ~~that a job can offer~~. to master professional skills ^{and climb up career ladder} ~~that a job can offer~~.

In addition, ~~students~~ the main issue with choosing a field based on job availability is the fact that a job market is always developing and changing and nobody can predict ^a market demand.

In conclusion, ~~I~~ believe that students' ~~shouldn't~~ shouldn't choose their field of study based on job availability. The job market is capricious. ~~For~~ Job satisfaction and ^a sense of fulfillment should outweigh availability of jobs in the field. Furthermore when you are doing what you really like, you can achieve ~~heights~~ in your

~~to~~ occupation potential and crown your labours with success.

University students

The choice of a career is definitely one of the most burning issues for modern university students, a lot of them take the availability of jobs in the field of their interest into consideration while deciding on their future profession. Below, I am going to present my arguments on this issue.

In my opinion, university educational programs should provide graduates with opportunity to find a good employment which can guarantee them steady income, job security and conditions for self-development and promotion. There is no point wasting four or five years at university educational programs ~~should be tailored in such a way so that they can fit in job requirements of employers~~, otherwise university graduates might end up ~~lack~~ studying subjects which have nothing to do with what employers want to see in their employees.

Consequently, university educational programs should be tailored in such a way so that they could fit in job requirements of employers, otherwise university graduates might end up being fully unprepared for their professional life and lack ~~the~~ necessary practical skills to compete for a prestigious vacancy. Moreover, it is quite natural for university students to analyse labour market in terms of available jobs to make a realistic plan of their professional career. As a result, they can easily predict what skills they need to develop, what jobs ~~they~~ they can start their career with, how quickly they can climb a career ladder and

What competitive advantages they need to have over other applicants.

In conclusion, I believe that rational analysis of labour market and its opportunities seems to be a reasonable option for students who want to achieve prosperity and fulfill their potential thus providing themselves with a decent life.

Schools and families have always been two major institutions responsible for fostering younger generations. However, the advances in technologies, economic constraints and pressure resulted in the situation when parents tend to be heavily overworked trying to satisfy their children's basic needs and considering education and personal development of their offspring to be responsibility of school teachers. Yet, parental participation in school life still seems to be important. In this work I am going to present my own arguments on this issue.

I believe wholeheartedly that parents need to volunteer their time to participate in various extra-curricular school activities to spend quality time with their children, to provide them with necessary support, to boost their confidence and serve successful role models. All this, will definitely contribute to children's personal development and help them to fulfill their potential.

In addition, I suppose that school children are likely to benefit a lot if parents and school teachers unite their efforts in order to make school life more engaging, providing students with a wide range of opportunities for discovering the world they live in, targeting their educational and personal needs in more effective ways, helping them to shape enquiring minds and instilling habits of autonomous learning, which is a prerequisite for modern students' progress.

In conclusion, I want to underline my point of view on the importance of close collaboration of teachers and parents for the development of efficient school life. Despite being busy and tired, parents should find time to take part in school life of their children.

All parents should be required to volunteer time to their children's schools! I totally agree with the claim. The main reason why I support this point of view is that schools are not able to cope with all difficulties of our current life. Prices are high, availability of qualified workers is quite low. So, parents should help school administrations to keep school buildings neat and well-repaired.

More than that, keeping order at schools is also very important. Not every school can afford a good security system. And male parents can volunteer to guard schoolchildren on weekdays, especially in dark evenings in winter.

Healthy, tasty food is of high importance for growing children. Schools often offer very limited food ranges in menus of their canteens. So, female parents can cook meals at home and bring them to schools to feed their hungry offsprings.

Parents can donate seeds to plant them in spring around school territories to make them look pleasant and it can easily be done for free as many households have their own gardens. It will save schools' funds and the money can be spent on equipment for PE lessons or salaries for teachers.

Parents can also volunteer their time to their children's schools organising theatre-going and educational journeys for pupils. It's a very important job as it enriches extra-school activities and makes teachers' lives easier.

In conclusion, I'd like to say that I'm with those who think that all parents should be required to volunteer time to schools where their kids study. It will make their children happier.

Nowadays, there seem to be people who think that university students should base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field. I strongly disagree with this claim. In my opinion, a student should pick the field of study depending not on how available the jobs in that field are, but on how interesting they are to the student. A student with a clear understanding of what job they find interesting and enjoyable should commit themselves to that job.

Some people can argue that looking for the most accessible jobs can guarantee that after graduation the student will be hired quickly which is very important to many university graduates, as they often struggle financially. While I recognise this issue and accept the fact that finding a profession that suits you personally can be very hard, I think it is important to understand that the most exhausting available jobs are often also the most exhausting, which can lead to depression and mental breakdown. Meanwhile a job that the student enjoys can become the foundation of their mental health, which almost guarantees their long-term wellbeing.

To sum up, I think that university students should not base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field. Instead, they should rely on their own personal preferences and on what they enjoy doing the most.

The hot take that has been a part of our society for decades is that if a goal is worthy, then any means taken are justifiable. While I certainly think it is a topic worth discussing, I have a few ~~small~~ problems about that kind of mentality.

The first and most obvious issue is that everyone's moral compass is different so while for some people risking human lives to ensure victory may seem like a necessary sacrifice, for others no cause would ever be worth people dying for it.

Many might say that it is a part of human nature to fight with everything we have got for what we think is right. While that is partially true, I think we have grown enough to be able to solve disputes between one another peacefully.

Another thing that we have to take into consideration is that if everybody did what they want to for goals they consider worthy, our countries would be submerged in chaos, violence and destruction which is ~~precisely~~ why we have laws and ~~socially~~ social norms to ~~control~~ protect us from ourselves and to live in peace and harmony with each other instead of giving in to the primal urge to do what we think is best for our cause even if it may be harmful to others.

In conclusion I would like to say that sometimes, things just don't work out the way we want them to, but with self-control and dedication, we can achieve anything without any drastic measures.

I strongly disagree with the claim that if a goal is ~~a~~ worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable. While the pursuit of noble objectives is commendable, the methods employed to achieve these goals must adhere to ethical standards and respect for human rights.

One of the primary reasons for this stance is the principle of moral integrity. Ends do not justify the means; rather, the means shape the character of the ends. For instance, if a political leader seeks to establish a just society ~~may be~~ but resorts to corruption, manipulation or violence, the resultant society may be tainted by these very actions. Historical examples abound, such as the French Revolution, where the initial goal of liberty and equality devolved into the Reign of Terror, demonstrating how noble intentions can lead to horrific outcomes when unethical means are employed. Moreover, justifying any means in pursuit of a worthy goal can lead to a slippery slope where increasingly harmful actions become acceptable. This rationale has been used to justify wars, torture, and other human rights violations under the guise of national security or moral superiority. The infamous phrase "the road to hell is paved with good intentions" encapsulates this danger: without ethical boundaries, the pursuit of a worthy goal can result in significant harm to individuals and society.

Lastly, achieving a worthy goal through unethical means often undermines the goal itself. For example, if environmental activists resort to illegal activities to protect nature, they risk alienating public support and delegitimizing their cause. True progress ~~requires~~ requires not only a worthy objective but also a commitment to ethical practices in its pursuit.

In conclusion, while worthy goals inspire us to strive for betterment, the means we choose are crucial. Upholding ethical standards ensures that our achievements are genuine and sustainable, fostering a society where both ends and means reflect our highest values.

1. Choosing a field of study may be challenging for many university applicants. However, it is argued that the decision should be made in accordance with the demand for a specific field of study in the economy and hence the sufficiency in its job supply. In my view, while it is important to take into consideration the availability of jobs, it is not the decisive factor. The choice should be based on one's passion for the subject, as it allows students to develop their best qualities and skills.

Firstly, such a choice would allow one to contribute the most to society, since studying what one deems fascinating is inevitably going to lead to a positive outcome. Secondly, choosing a field of study based on personal interest and ability results in finding people with similar qualities, thus allowing to create a strong and united community. Finally, it is beneficial for mental health, as doing what one fancies the most positively affects one's well-being. Either of these arguments, however, may not be applicable to a choice based on the availability of jobs in the field.

In spite of the arguments presented above a different claim is made. It is argued that a choice based on the availability of jobs has a much more positive impact on the economy. However, there are other factors influencing people, such as physical and mental health, personal preferences and inclinations. These are the factors that affect people the most, hence why the choice of a field of study should not be based purely on the availability of jobs.

All in all, although it is not unimportant to take into account the availability of jobs, the choice should be based on personal preferences and skills.

There is a commonly held belief that if a goal is ~~definitely~~ worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable. To be honest, I absolutely agree with the aforementioned statement since every accomplishment can determine and ~~and~~ shape one's future.

Firstly, if ~~if~~ a person sets their sights on something, they will go to great lengths to achieve it. They can sacrifice their personal life and mental well-being. However, life is ~~generally deemed~~ ^{quite} unpredictable, thus, a mere mistake can play a significant role and lead to irreversible consequences. To be more precise, a longed-for goal literally causes addiction, and if one does not implement their plans into reality, then ~~they~~ they can give up altogether ~~and~~ and succumb to depression. This situation can be seen in the book "Sister Carrie" when Carrie's second lover loses everything because of the Great Depression. He promises that ~~he can~~ it is still possible to find a solution, yet he miserably fails and stops trying.

Judging from this example, it is fair to say that ~~all~~ ^{all} means are justifiable when it comes to life-changing dreams. Not only does one's accomplishment bring success, but it also provides the so-called "friendly environment". By this, I mean that people ~~work~~ are sometimes attracted by one's praiseworthy ~~deeds~~ deeds. Therefore, you can meet a lot of new friends and establish invaluable connections ~~which~~ that can positively impact your life. To illustrate this viewpoint, I ~~can~~ can recall my best friend's situation. She asked a native speaker to write some essays instead of her, and she was enrolled into Harvard. ~~She met her husband in the university and friends.~~ ^{met} She ~~is~~ has become a knowledgeable surgeon. ^{her talent}

To conclude, I genuinely believe that if a goal is ~~indeed~~ essential, then no one can judge how a person attains it. Everything ~~is~~ can be justified.

~~She~~ Her talent helped her become a surgeon, and she ^{met} ~~met~~ her husband in the university.

These days, the question of whether one should aspire to achieve their goals by any means may well spark heated debate. Emphasized in this essay are the main reasons why, to my view, any rational measures taken to follow one's dream are undoubtedly justifiable.

It goes without saying that, if ~~a person is~~ ^{one were} truly passionate about their goal, they would want to achieve it no matter what. Indeed, no obstacles or unforeseen challenges should stand in one's way in pursuit of their dream. ~~Furthermore~~ ~~Asi~~ Aside from ~~possessing~~ ^{having} such qualities necessary to achieve one's goal as willpower and tenacity, one should be prepared to risk ~~and what~~ ^{anything that} they have now. ~~However~~ ~~Nevertheless~~ to follow their lifelong passion.

However, it is crucial to ~~assess~~ assess the challenges one might face ~~on their~~ during their way to the desired outcome. Additionally, one shouldn't ~~rush~~ ^{carelessly} rush into the decision to follow their dream. Instead, one should ~~evaluate~~ evaluate the risks and try their best to ~~find~~ minimize the risks ^{that they might possibly encounter} and find the best approach to achieving their goal.

To conclude, I believe it is of utmost importance ~~to~~ not to give up on one's dream despite the difficulties that ~~you~~ might appear in one's way. However, in doing so, one ~~must not~~ mustn't forget about ~~the~~ reality they live in real-life circumstances ~~and~~ in pursuit of happiness and desired results. ~~I entirely agree~~

If a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable.

Does a worthy goal justify any means taken to attain it? It has been a debatable topic among people through decades. In my opinion, means of achieving the goal cannot be justified by the goal itself. In this essay I am going to explain my ~~opinion~~ point of view.

Firstly, while picking means to attain a goal, a person should always consider that they are a member of the society and that they are limited by the moral and legal rules of it and by the boundaries of other people. ~~It~~ If at some point every person decided to follow their goals, using any means and ignoring other people, society would eventually spiral into chaos. Thus, means that help attain the goal of one person, but cause harm to ~~the~~ another, cannot be justified in any case.

Secondly, not every person is able to thoroughly analyse their goals and come to a conclusion if they are worth their means of attaining it or not. Besides, it is sometimes hard to consider the outcome of a path that a person decides to follow to achieve their goal, and the consequences he or she would eventually face. For example, imagine a student willing to pass the exam, but instead of studying for it, he decides to cheat on it, which he thinks is a faster and easier way. He has a good goal, but cheating on the exam can lead him to not being able to accomplish a bigger goal of getting an education, thus his means cannot be justified or good for him.

In conclusion, I think that people should always try to achieve their goals, but they should also always be considerate of the means of attaining them, because not all means can be justified.

In today's rapidly changing world, the choice of a field of study is often influenced by job availability. I strongly agree with the notion that students should consider job prospects when selecting their ~~major~~ majors. This approach can lead to a more secure and fulfilling career after graduation.

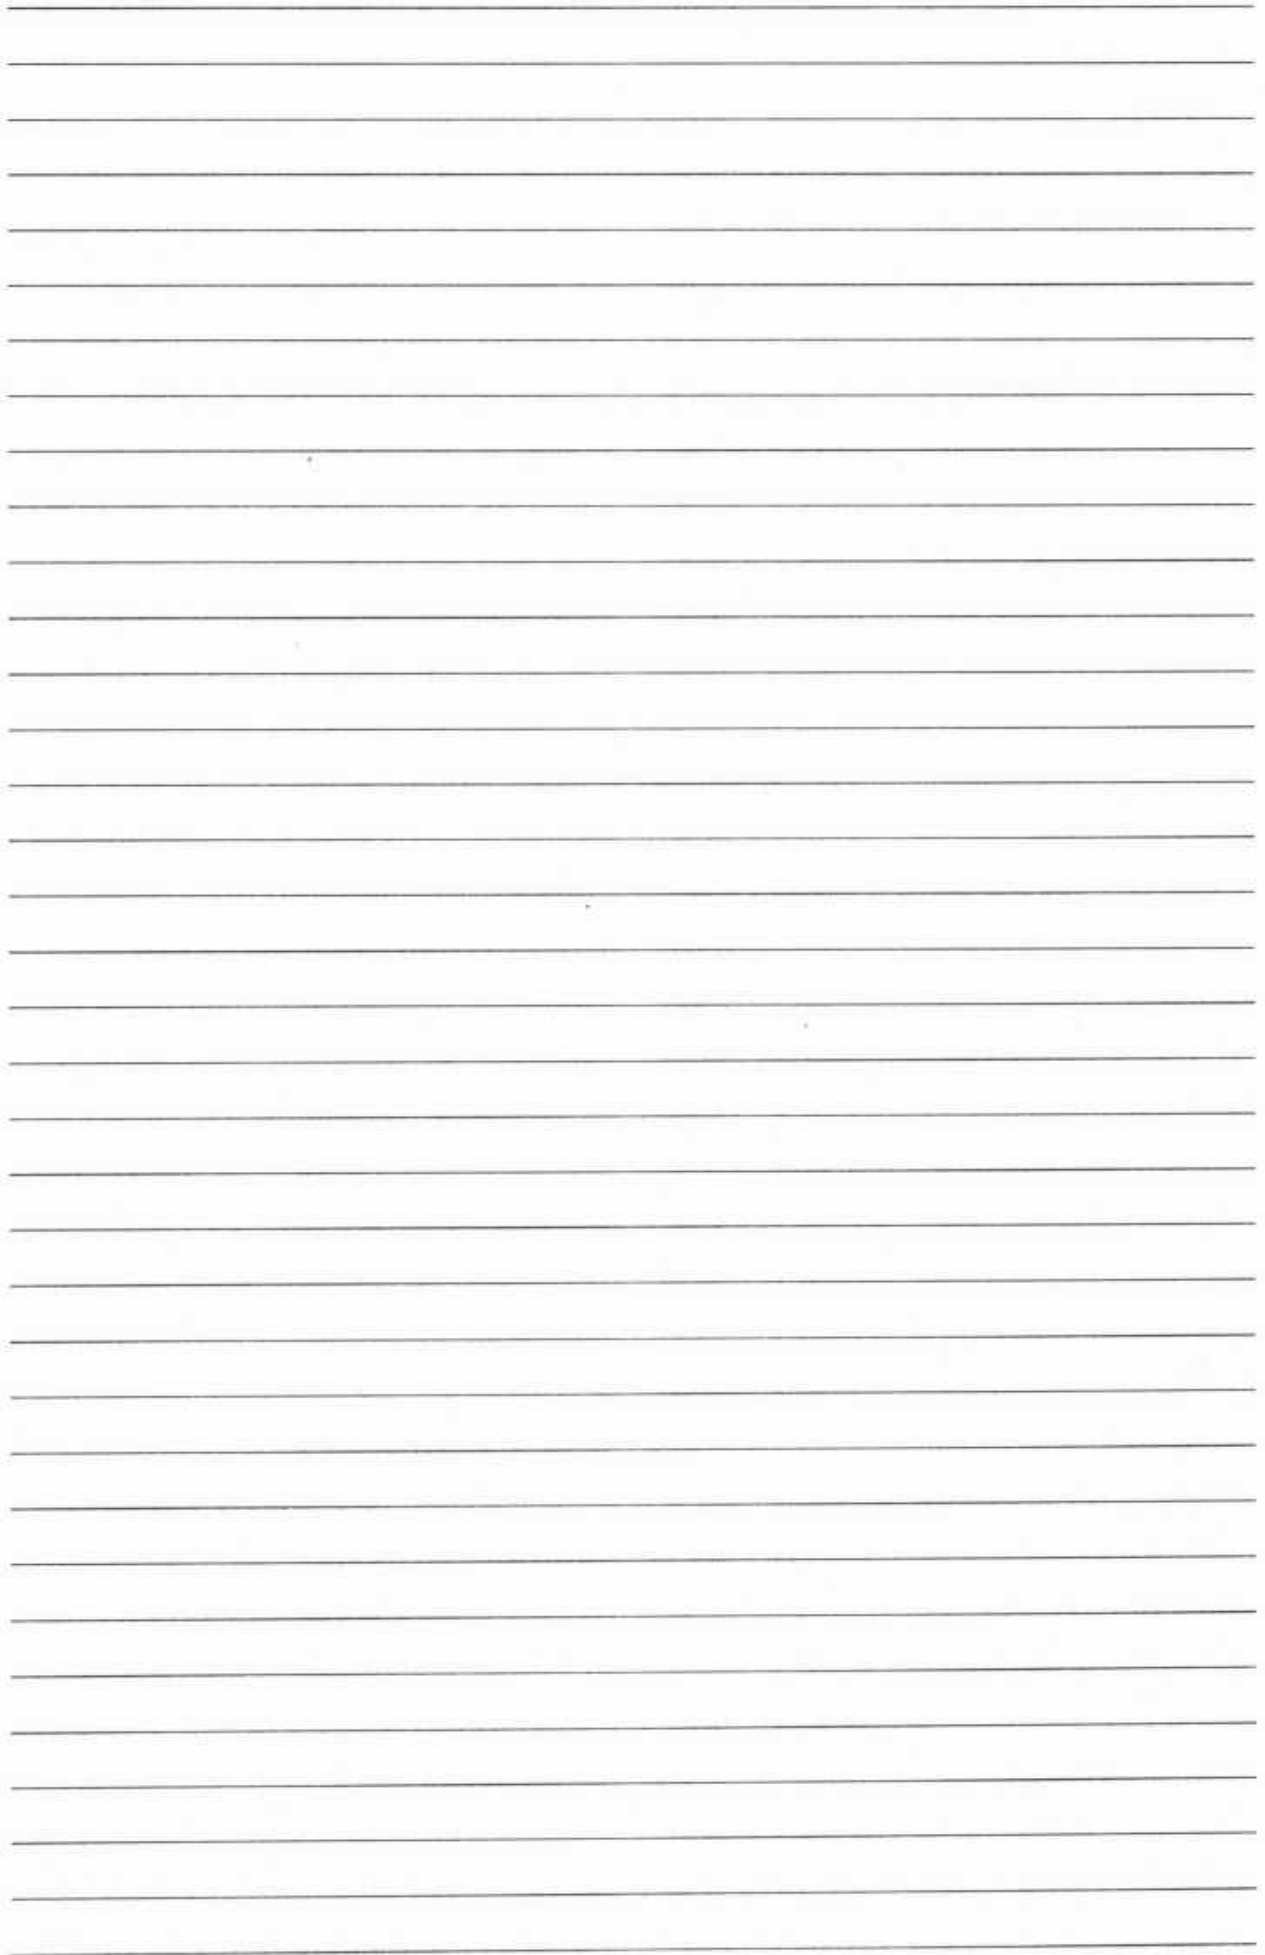

Firstly, the job market is competitive, and not all degrees ^{high demand, students increase their} guarantee employment. By focusing on fields with ~~chances~~ ^{chances} of finding a job after ~~high demand~~ graduation. For instance, sectors like healthcare, technology, and engineering consistently show significant ~~growth~~ growth and are projected to keep expanding. Choosing a degree in one of these areas can provide students with better job security.

Secondly, being aware of job availability allows students to make informed choices from a financial perspective but also helps in building a career that aligns with the current needs of society.

However, some may argue that students should follow their passions regardless of job availability. While pursuing a passion is important, it can lead to difficulties if that field has limited opportunities. A balance between passion and practicality is crucial for long-term success and stability.

In conclusion, I believe that prospective students should consider job availability when choosing their fields of study. This strategy can enhance their career prospects, ensuring they are ~~as~~ equipped for the workforce of ~~tomorrow~~ tomorrow, and ultimately lead to a more secure future.

It is ingrained in humans' psychology that when they actually desire to achieve something, nothing can stop them. In order to attain their goal, they sometimes use questionable methods raise a lot of debates on whether they are justified or not. While some people argue that if a goal is worthy, then any means ~~to~~ taken to achieve it are justifiable, I strongly disagree with this claim. I am going to explain my point of view.

Let's take an example of a group of soldiers who were tortured and held in captivity. One day they were given a chance to save their lives and return to their home by telling secret information about their military bases. While saving themselves with this option seems to be worthy to the soldiers, their decision isn't justified as they put lives of their comrades and, potentially, lives of innocent people in danger. This is an example of how one's attempts to prevent a small disaster cause a bigger one that will affect other people. From my point of view, no one is above the consequences of their decisions. They can't justify their actions by referring to the greatness of the goal that they pursue. That is a reason why laws exist nowadays. If they did not, then people would simply start doing what they judge as worthy things to do, eventually creating chaos and anarchy.

In conclusion, people must be responsible for their decisions. If everyone stuck to the idea that any means to attain a worthy goal are justifiable, then there won't be stability in society anymore.

All people have goals — that's the essence of our existence. Considering today's labour market conditions, many people come to a conclusion that, when choosing a field of study, university students should prioritise those with available jobs, rather than the desired ones. I completely disagree with this statement. I will comment on it below.

First of all, I believe a student must choose a university major based on their preferences and interests only. If they study things they are ~~genuin~~ genuinely interested in (in the years that follow), they will ~~stay~~ never get sick of them. Secondly, a field with available jobs does not always coincide with one's abilities. For instance, a technician, who used to study physics and maths at school, could never become a stellar literature faculty student. Thus, I am convinced a choice of a field of study must be based on one's interests and skills only.

55

In fact, there ~~are~~ are many opponents of such view these days. They say opting for a field with available jobs almost guarantees a student occupation after getting a degree. Having said that, we must not forget that ~~there~~ many universities today arrange numerous internship ~~comp~~ programmes, which guarantee job to everyone and not just some specific fields. Besides, they say, the labour market is too competitive to provide graduates with time to excel in their desired field and demands workers right now and right here. Well, I think, sometimes a student need to learn it the hard way and concentrate on becoming the expert of ~~his~~ their field. to stand out among other applicants in the labour market.

56

Summarizing, ~~it~~ it is better to live in the competitive environment and do the job you like, constantly improving your skills and becoming the best version of yourself, rather than be occupied with something you chose ~~beca~~ simply because of the "availability of jobs" 43

Through many years of society's existence there has been a popular yet controversial belief that if a certain goal is deemed worthy enough, then any way of achieving it is justifiable. However, my opinion on this topic is quite the opposite compared to that of people who support this idea.

To begin with, I find such thinking a direct pathway to a start of numerous crimes all over the world as the person trying to achieve something will inevitably lose any morals left for the cause if there is no restriction. For example, a person may try to interest people in the ~~po~~ global ecological problems by sharing information about this, but if they will not gather the attention needed they might escalate into doing acts of terrorism, harming innocents in return. Moreover, selfish and radical individuals can start using this belief to support their ~~un~~ cruel actions with an important ~~cause~~ cause, making them "justified". A prime example of this behavior are corporations which cut their struggling employees' pay for their own benefit.

Despite all the facts presented, there still exists an opinion that all the harm will be helpful in the end. Although there will be some ~~benefit~~ help from these incidents, the damage caused ~~can~~ may even be more catastrophic than what was before.

University students should base their choice of the field of study on the availability of jobs in that field

I disagree with the claim that students should base their choice of the field of study solely on the availability of jobs. While job prospects are important, there are other factors that deserve equal consideration when selecting a major.

Firstly, pursuing a career based only on job availabilities can lead to dissatisfaction and burnout. Passion for one's work is crucial for long-term success and happiness.

Students who choose fields they genuinely enjoy are more likely to excel academically and professionally. Conversely, students who choose what to study only for ~~offer~~ secure employment may find themselves unhappy and unmotivated in their careers.

Secondly, the job market is dynamic and constantly evolving. Fields that are in high demand today might not be as relevant tomorrow due to technological progress and advancements, economic shifts or societal changes. Therefore, basing one's choice of career entirely on current job trends could leave one unprepared for future challenges.

Thirdly, a well-rounded education prepares individuals for various opportunities beyond just immediate job placements. A liberal arts degree, for example, develops critical thinking, communication, and problem-solving skills that are valuable across many industries. These transferable skills can open doors to diverse career paths and enable adaptability in an ever-changing workforce.

In conclusion, while job availability is an essential factor, it should not be the sole determinant in choosing a field of study. Personal passion, adaptability and the development of transferable skills are equally important for long-term professional fulfillment and success. A student driven by passion, ~~on~~ will be more likely to excel, innovate, and ultimately carve out his niche, regardless of current job trends.

It goes without saying that choosing a field of study is one of the most important ~~and hardest~~ decisions in people's lives. Nowadays, it is widely considered that this choice should be based on the availability of jobs in the field. Personally, I strongly disagree with this belief, and I would like to propose some arguments to support my point of view.

To begin with, I am inclined to believe that university students should base this make-or-break decision on their interests, abilities and aptitudes. Otherwise, they ~~will be disappointed~~ may find themselves bitterly disappointed with their jobs as they will not bring them any joy or satisfaction. For ~~instance~~ example, if one aspires to study literature or languages, but is forced to choose economics as there is an abundance of available jobs in that field, he or she will be deeply miserable doing his ^{or her} work. Meanwhile, ~~as long as~~ ~~simply~~ ~~enjoy~~ ~~a~~ students sincerely enjoys their fields of study, they will be able to become more ~~successful~~ ~~and~~ prosperous as there is always a place for a diligent worker in the market.

Besides, it is worth mentioning that the world is constantly ^{changing}, hence, it cannot be foreseen ~~where~~ ^{in the} whether a particular field of study will be in demand in several years or not. What is more, we live in the age of technologies, ~~when~~ which means that every job is at a risk of ~~technologies~~ displacement. It is common knowledge that artificial intelligence can imitate humans, and ~~do~~ ~~replicate~~ ~~tasks~~ that many jobs that require doing repetitive tasks can be done by robots in the future. Therefore, one should not rely on the availability of jobs in the market when deciding on ~~their~~ a major.

In conclusion, ~~it is not my firm~~ I believe that students should base their choice of study on their interests and follow their hearts.

In conclusion, I believe that students should always follow their hearts and decide on what to study according to their interests, ~~rather than~~ not the availability of jobs.

It goes without saying that choosing a ^{major} field of study in university plays crucial role in a person's life. Some people are inclined to think that the choice of a studying field ^{must} should be based on the availability of jobs in that field. However, I believe that a major choice should be based only on a person's interests. In this essay I am going to discuss the topic and provide some arguments that support my point of view.

Firstly, the choice of a major has an effect on a person's future. People are tend to ~~choose~~ ^{find} a job in accordance with their studying field. Hence, if a person's choice ~~were~~ was based only on the market demand, they are likely to dislike their job. Therefore, they won't be happy throughout the whole life.

Secondly, I believe that ~~the choice should be based only on~~ a person can be successful in any field. If one has passion for their studying field, they ~~will~~ are eager to delve into it. Therefore, they are likely to succeed in it and get a high-paid job.

Nevertheless, some people believe that it is better to base a choice only on the market demand. They think that this will provide a person with ~~a~~ firm ^{and stable} ~~and stable~~ job ~~in the~~ future. However, there is no guarantee that one will ~~not~~ succeed, even if their job is ~~not~~ in high demand.

In conclusion, it is my firm believe that the major choice should be based on a person's interests. ~~This is likely to that can make their~~

~~life better and provide them~~ They are bound

~~life better~~ enhance their life.

Some people believe that all parents should be required to volunteer time to their children's schools. In my opinion the statement, as it is, does not make sense. As far as I know, the word "Volunteer" means "to do something useful willingly and without payment or other personal benefits". Thus, people cannot be "required to volunteer".

No one can deny that parents could contribute a lot to their children's schools, from cleaning the classes to organising events, and, in some cases, they can even substitute teachers. But, helpful or not, I do not think parents should have duties at schools. They already do their lot for the society at work, and have enough chores of their own, without having to share their resources with schools for free.

Nevertheless, there's a way for schools to benefit from the parents' knowledge and experience. I would suggest that schools provide free lunches for the children, whose parents dedicate time to help. That way people will be motivated to do what they can.

I acknowledge the fact that public schools are free. For this reason, some people claim, parents should do all they can, in gratitude for the affordable education of their children. But I believe education should be free and it's not something parents should overwork to get. On the contrary, people should be encouraged to go to public schools, instead of providing money for private schools.

All things considered, in my opinion volunteering cannot be made mandatory, but parents can be motivated to contribute resources to their children's schools.

There is a claim that students of universities should make a choice of what field to specialize on according to how available jobs in this field are. Personally, I disagree with this statement, and now I will explain why.

To begin with, I firmly believe that subjects that a person is planning to study should be chosen depending on what brings this person pleasure, not anything else.

Firstly, if one chooses a field in ^{an} attempt to obtain a job, not thinking about their own preferences, then their ^{future} job itself may ^{fast} start to begin to seem fairly boring. In that case, a person is bound to feel displeased with their work and might even ^{decide} choose to study something else instead of proceeding with the chosen career. Eventually, it may result in wasting a great deal of time concentrating on something not necessary and have negative consequences on a person's ^{state of mind} mind state. Secondly, if ~~a~~ one chooses ^{decide} to study certain subjects at university not taking into account what things they relish, there is a huge possibility that they will not reach success in that sphere. The reason is that people normally ~~achie~~ make much more achievements ^{when they} as long as ^{do} something enjoyable. So, it is more logical to choose a field of study according to one's preferences and work hard to obtain a desirable job, ~~then~~ than to ~~make decision~~ spend one's life working in a sphere where they have almost no chance to succeed.

In conclusion, all things considered, choosing a field of study at university according to the ~~over~~ possibility ~~a~~ of getting a job in this field is not the best idea. To my way of thinking, a person's preferences should play a much ~~two~~ bigger role in ~~deciding the~~ making decisions ~~about~~ connected with future career.

Students' reasons for choosing a particular field of study have always differed greatly, hence the controversy around this problem. The opinion that appears to be quite popular with people is that students' choice of their major should depend on the availability of the job in that field requiring that education. This opinion is indeed relevant, however, I do not share it. I believe one should follow their passion and interest when choosing a field of study. The arguments proving my view are provided further.

Firstly and foremost, one's job should ~~fully correspond~~^{align} with one's interests because it helps one to build a stable and develop the feeling of stability and contentment. ~~The work done forcefully is more likely to be executed poorly. Besides, it is not a sustainable way to earn a living since it is mentally draining to do the job one dislikes systematically. By choosing a major one finds enjoyment they make both the studying process and further job execution easier. That is due to thanks to enjoyment which has been scientifically proven to encourage one to continue doing something despite challenges. All in all, choosing a field of study based on one's passion is a key factor contributing to one's thriving in the future.~~

Secondly, it is possible to find a job one genuinely wants since all the professions ~~that have not gone obsolete~~ are relevant to a certain extent. The demand for particular ~~jobs~~ tend to fluctuate over time, so even if one's preferred occupation is not the most necessary ~~right now~~, it will ^{any profession} become more important with time. People's needs change but the essential ones remain the same, and people of all professions are crucial to cater to them.

Thirdly, nowadays there are ~~a lot of~~^{plenty of} opportunities of altering one's field of occupation while ~~not~~^{with one same} getting a new degree. For instance, the widespread implementation of modern technologies engages people of all professions to in ~~help the much~~ ^{ing} ~~teaching~~ machines to ~~execute~~ the monotonous work done by people and give the latter an opportunity to focus on more advanced the work requiring more creativity and advanced skills.

To conclude, students should follow their passions when it comes to choosing their field of studying for it is the most sustainable way of earning money and finding joy in one both in one's job and outside of it. Someone truly passionate about their profession will surely find a job that would satisfy them both mentally and financially.

Discoveries are crucial parts of human evolution. They push the technological progress further and give us ^{more and more} knowledge about the world we live in. But how are they made? One popular opinion suggests that, although discoveries and creations require a lot of talent, research and effort, they are mostly accidental. I can fully agree with that statement.

While searching for something new and previously unknown, it is almost impossible to guess what to expect. Thus, most of the discoveries are usually unexpected and are led to by an accident made in the process of answering some other question. We ~~don't~~ ^{can't} know what the outcome would be prior to the discovery being made, which is why we can make one only while researching another question. There are countless examples of accidental discoveries throughout history, the most notable being the creation of penicillin, which was made due to the clumsiness of the creator.

Some might disagree with me, saying that every discovery requires a theoretical basis, which outlines what is possible and what is not, as with Dmitri Mendeleev, who knew ~~exactly~~ how elements are constructed before making his ~~ff~~ famous periodic table. Defending my position, I must remind, that theories themselves are based on discoveries and are constantly proven wrong. That means we can't surely rely on anything while making a discovery.

All in all, discoveries require working with the unknown. It is like walking in a room full of different objects blindfolded. One can discover the object only ~~but~~ by stumbling upon it accidentally. Even if he knows what direction to go in, he is never sure.

There is a widely held view that if one has a worthy goal, all efforts directed at achieving it are justifiable. However, I believe this is not always the case as this statement can be interpreted in a number of ways.

First of all, the definition of "worthy" can be perceived differently by people, which makes it somewhat subjective. To some getting into college and landing a job could mean having a decent goal, to others - successfully robbing a bank and making a fortune. The latter example includes steps, which could potentially do harm to the society, therefore, none of the actions performed in the process can be justified. Moreover, it is impossible to predict to what lengths some people would be ready to go while pursuing their goals, which yet again proves that it could end up being beyond the pale and completely unacceptable.

Second of all, there are situations when one has to let go, however demoralizing and frustrating it may be. If a goal requires too much effort, that a person simply and you simply don't not have what it takes to achieve it, then it is a completely unjustified sacrifice, which most likely will not even result in anything reasonable. Resorting to severe measures which deprive you of your happiness in order to achieve your ambition will ultimately lead to depressive & psychological problems that may take years of therapy to work through. In other words, if you have done your best ^{but} and the mission is not accomplished, it is not worth bending over backwards to change something.

Summing up, I would like to say having a worthy goal does not always imply that not always does having a decent goal mean that you should put out all the stops, as the effort you put in outweighs the benefits this goal brings, ^{has}. In addition, ~~resorting~~ ^{the} having no limits or boundaries in your pursuit of it in the means of achieving it can have terrible consequences and force you to do disdaintful things. Therefore, ~~the~~ the means of ^{reaching} attaining a target goal, no matter how worthy, cannot always be justified.

Young people often hear from their parents that it is better to choose a degree which can provide ^{stable} ~~stabiliz~~ work. Usually they mean that jobs in that particular field are more available. However, I disagree with this opinion as I believe that students should base their choice on their abilities. If you love the job, you will succeed anyway.

First of all, it is common knowledge that people who ^{are} really fond of their work are more productive than people who hate what they do. Highly motivated people are eager to develop their skills and learn something new. Motivation plays a crucial role in succeeding in any field. Even if a student chooses highly available job ~~but does~~, which ~~he~~ does not ~~give~~ provide a feeling of reward, this student will not ~~not~~ do its best. For example, ~~famous~~ popular writer Dostoevsky was a real professional and did not ~~change~~ change his job even though it was dangerous as he expressed ~~his~~ opinion which was not allowed by the government.

Secondly, availability of jobs can change ~~to~~ due to economic, political or ~~ex~~ historical reasons. ~~The~~ Modern world changes so fast that some people ~~don't~~ do not know about new ~~technolog~~ jobs. When new technologies appear, new jobs are created. At the same time technologies often lead to disappearing of jobs as robots can do ~~these~~ ~~the~~ ~~same~~ the same but even more effective. For example, the covid 19 ~~changed the~~ ~~the~~ ~~world of work~~ pandemic led to changes in the working world of humanity in general. Due to ~~the~~ the pandemic a lot of new jobs, ~~which~~ appeared. People cannot predict such global changes and be sure about their working future anymore.

In conclusion, I believe ^{that students} should not base their choice of a degree on the availability of jobs as their personal skills ~~and~~ can help them to ~~become~~ ~~some~~ develop in this field and become a real professional. Moreover, humanity cannot predict future changes, so the availability ~~of~~ of ~~job~~ particular jobs can change in any moment.

It has always been hard to decline what is crucial when one chooses their field of studies. Some suppose that university students should base their choice on the job market. However, I would like to argue that the following statement is not correct, yet is reasonable.

To begin with, I disagree with the statement, as people are more interested in some things that might be considered not profitable as those fields are those of low availability, ~~yet~~ sometimes, those people may become really professional and educated in their area of interest and then become twice as successful as those who chose their profession basing their choice on what was in demand, as they love their job more than those who ~~did~~ chose centering everything around the market.

Yet, the statement has common sense ~~be~~ despite all the things ^{mentioned} ~~listed~~ in the previous paragraph. You are more likely to get employed in a ~~pro~~ field of high demand. Still, I suppose it is important to consider that the demand is very flexible and may ^{change} when one ^{graduates}. To sum up, even though basing the choice of field on job market ~~isn't~~ is ~~a~~ ^{description} rational, I disagree, as ^{that it is what every student should do,} one's passion may lead him to happiness faster and ~~more~~ ^{also} bring him more abundance. I would like to remind that a person's passion, ambition and flamboyance are key ~~when the topic is career~~ to successful life, career and family, and those things are not to be left out, as the student makes a choice. That highlights the importance of choosing a field basing on one's preferences, not the soulless market that changes every minute.

Everyone have^s ~~their~~ ^{the} own goals and everyone wants to attain it. When you finally reach something you wanted for a long time you feel amazing. Because of it, some people think that any method in achieving a goal is ~~it~~ justified. I hardly disagree on that. In my opinion, there are a lot of actions that you should ~~not~~ to do to achieve your goal.

~~Firstly~~ The greater the goal — the more controversial methods can be used, but there is a limit. Even if you ~~are have very important~~ have been trying to accomplish something for your whole life, you should not break the law. This ~~get~~ will get you in trouble. You should ~~at~~ also obey the rules in any competition you are a member of. Cheating or sabotage not only can get you disqualified, but also ruin that nice feeling of a win, because you got unfair advantage.

~~Secondly~~ A lot of people may consider lying as a way to achieve something. Lying is not a crime, if you don't lie to the police, judge etc. But dishonesty still ~~gives an~~ ~~unfair advantage~~ ~~it~~ can ruin the feeling of the victory. In some cases lie can be justified, for example, if it helps someone and doesn't affect anyone badly.

In conclusion, ~~you~~ you should not break the rules and compete, train ~~and~~ fairly. The process of attaining the goal is as good as the goal itself. It will make you more determined, help with discipline, which would ~~not~~ happen if you cheat. I think if you're honest, your achievement will be way more pleasant to get. Everything is possible even without controversial methods, so stay honest with everyone and most importantly don't lie to yourself.

There is a widely known saying: 'end justifies the means'. It refers to actions taken to achieve something as unimportant. People who adhere to this 'wisdom' always miss a crucial aspect of moral.

Undoubtedly, moral principles exist to follow them as they guide us through our life. However, we often forget that it is more ~~simple~~ complex than we ~~think~~ deem to evaluate both means and the outcome. I personally believe that to be completely confident that your actions cause no harm and your aim is laudable, you should not abide by the saying 'end justifies the means' or ~~something~~ something along that lines. The means are also key and they matter a lot.

So, the simple example is: imagine you are applying for a job in a prestigious ~~company~~ company you dream about. There are only two candidates including you and the opponent is evidently more competent and deserves to be hired. Both take a test to see who is more suitable to be employed; another candidate leaves a room for two minutes, leaving his work on the desk. Would you ^{tamper with} ~~spoil~~ his test in order to reach your aim? I hope most of you would ~~answer~~ answer 'no, of course I'd not' or something alike. In this case it would be absolutely immoral to assume the victory, achieved by eliminating a worthy rival. Overall, the means are unfair and there can be no excuse of doing so, regardless of your irresistible drive to get the dream job.

In conclusion, I totally disagree with the idea that if a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable. You can tell a lot about a person judging by the actions he or she opts for. It is not mean that shape our personality and character, but only we who make a choice. Speaking about me, I would always thoroughly consider steps I take on the way to my goal. It really makes a difference to me.

Nowadays a host of people do nothing but ~~try to~~ endeavour to achieve ~~their~~ their own goals. It is possible to hear the bulk of motivation speeches ~~to that claim~~ ~~to~~ from successful and astonishing coaches, the main point of which is to focus only on the people's ^{own} desires and forget about global problems. Personally, I loathe the idea of being selfish and do everything, whether ~~the~~ appalling actions or funny things, to attain an individual's goal.

First of all, some means of achieving the goal can be exceedingly damaging for other people. Not only may it do harm, but also kill somebody or ~~some~~ ^{destroy} demolish buildings. For instance, if an ~~the~~ individual dreams of invent an atomic bomb, it can bring ~~tragic~~ ^{tragic} consequences on the point of achieving this goal. In this situation, it is not justifiable to do everything ~~with~~ to attain this desire as long as its consequences will have poor effect.

Furthermore, the ^{global problems} ~~global problems~~ will be unnoticed ~~supposing~~ if people are focused only on their own goals and desires. For example, ~~if~~ somebody dreams of nothing but to build a plant. However, the ~~remnants~~ ^{production} remnants of ~~product~~ of this factory bring severe damage to ~~the~~ seas and oceans. In this case this person takes all means to attain his or her goal, forgetting about global pollution. As a consequence, ~~our~~ ^{our} planet gets a ~~lot~~ ^{lot} of mess.

On ~~that~~ balance, ~~on no account~~ in no circumstances should people do everything ~~that~~ they could to attain their goals. If they do, they can do appalling harm to others. What is more, they can severely damage the flora and the ~~fauna~~ ^{fauna} of our planet. They had better focus on global problems and achieve goals without bringing harm to ~~people~~ ^{the} other people and our planet.

Some people claim that if a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable. Personally, I totally disagree with this point of view.

First of all, the value of each goal is very subjective. In my opinion, egoists, who do not consider others' interest and think that their own ones are the most important, cannot be justified. For example, a student decided to cheat on exams since he thought that his aim to get in Oxford is worthy. However, there are other people who would disagree ^{with him} because in their opinion this is unacceptable; ~~hence he should have written the exams as the rules said.~~ and not even vital.

Secondly, using any means to achieve a significant goal is amoral because it can involve harming someone. For instance, many people ~~would~~ will agree that the president's life is important, yet if saving it would mean killing ~~innocent~~ a person who needs an organ transplantation just like him, then it would be unfair, because every human has the right for a life.

Finally, taking any means to attain a goal, which one considers as a worthy one, is not only bad from a moral point of view, but it is also illegal ~~is~~ in some cases. The renowned story about Robin Hood is a great example. In order to help poor people, he became a criminal and started to rob rich ones. This goal might seem fair, ~~is~~ ~~too~~. However, ~~some of the robbed people~~ ~~could~~ what he was doing is still a crime because stealing someone's goods is forbidden in every society.

To sum up, I believe that using any means to achieve even a great goal is not justifiable because this is amoral and ^{can be} illegal in some cases.

"If a goal is worthy, then any means to attain it are justifiable," — is a statement that many people would agree with. I, however, do not support this position. Even though the idea is pure, some individuals could take it as a sign to take ^{the matter of} their situation to extreme levels that might violate the rights of others, or hurt the person themselves.

Firstly, no one has the right to damage other people's wellbeing, or their property or personal items, even if it serves their purpose. Moreover, it is illegal in many countries, and if you commit a crime of that sort, the victim could press charges, and you would face a trial. For instance, in the light of recent events we witnessed such a trial for the murderer of the United Health^{is}Care CEO. He is not yet convicted of that crime, but all the evidence points to a vigilant motive: the company's decline rate ~~was~~ ^{is} severely high and due to that many residents of the USA are left with ~~untreated~~ serious conditions untreated. The killer's manifesto contained messages of hope for a change in the ~~the~~ healthcare system. His radical actions led to public's dismay and some started to justify the crime because it was "for a good reason", which is unspeakable. Nobody ~~is~~ should be able to take someone else's life and walk free, unpunished after that.

Secondly, no reason or goal could be good enough to explain a person's desire to harm themselves in order to achieve it. A one or two sleepless nights could potentially be justified by preparations for an exam, for example, but if it turns into ^a chronic exhaustion or insomnia, this is a sign to stop and take care of oneself, or get help from a professional. We all should value our wellbeing, and pay ^{close} attention to how our organisms react to different stressors and always be on alert for signs of ~~struggle~~ⁱⁿ struggle.

In conclusion, I stand strongly by the position that not every time the outcome justifies the means that were taken to achieve it. Everyone should learn when enough is enough and it is time to stop.

The issue of choosing a profession has always been one of utmost importance for the younger generations. The choice is crucial: a single decision will determine the course of one's life. It is on them whether the choice should be strategic and rational or mindful of personal aspirations and dreams. It is believed by some people that university students' choice of a field of study should be based on the availability of jobs in that field. I wholeheartedly believe that to be the right thought process when picking a university major. Considering the current state of economy, the almost unreachable standard of the job requirements, and the rising cost of living, it is best to make sure that the subjects you are studying are going to give you financial security in the future. In a world where even applicants for the lowest-paying positions at mass-production fast food chains are required to have a degree of higher education, it is essential to be strategic when it comes to selecting your future career route. Analyzing the market and choosing a specialty that is the most adequate for one's capabilities will be the right way to go. Yes, that way of planning your life might come with some sacrifices, since the job markets tend to be not the most welcoming when it comes to creative fields of study. However, the financial stability is going to ensure one's ability to chase their creative dreams and experiment with hobbies, side hustles and second careers.

To sum up, it is best to follow rationality when deciding on a field of study for university students. Careful evaluation of one's options, followed by a thorough analysis of the job market will lay the foundation for the future career exploration and creative development.

Should University Students Base Their Choice of a Field of Study on the Availability of Jobs?

Finding a field of study that allows you to pursue your career aspirations is one of the most life-changing and difficult decisions. There are several ways of tackling the problem. One of them is to major in a subject that will make you a specialist in a field with a recognised lack of employees. Is it the best solution?

At first, the strategy appeals as the only way to be needed in a corporate environment or a governmental structure. You choose your major with the accordance with the demands of the labour market and then, of course, you are offered a position with a high salary. The first thing worth mentioning is that you might hate your degree and your future job, if this was not something you expected. Any job becomes a torture, if it was not chosen for at least a bit of interest in the field.

Moreover, there is one more tendency that can destroy this strategy. Today our job market changes as fast as the world does. Every five to ten years a field, which is lacking staff, is different, making it almost impossible to predict the next ^{one} shift. For example, as one might say, now there is a lack of programmers. If every today's student decides to major in computer science, in ten years they won't be able to find a company to hire them.

So, to sum it all up, it is better to choose a field of study based on ~~your~~ your own preferences and ideas of each profession. One should never major in the subject unless it presents an opportunity to become a professional of one's dreams, not labour market's demands.

All parents should be required to volunteer time to their children's school.

We live in the day and age where numerous technologies, namely the Internet, are rapidly developing. However, it takes away the most important and indispensable thing one can have: time, especially quality time spent with your loved ones. Therefore, I am sure that each and every parent should volunteer their time to children's schools. To support my point of view, I provide further reasoning.

To start with, time spent at school can help parents to get better at understanding their child. Observing the environment and communicating with other parents or teachers - everything mentioned ~~above~~ before plays crucial ^{role} part in establishing good relationships with children, because of the parents' awareness of the situation at school. Recent research has shown that parents who volunteered time to school were closer to their kids as distinct from those who chose not to participate in ~~that~~ ^{the} activity.

Moreover, volunteering time to schools can improve children's grades and ~~overall~~ academic performance overall. Those parents who are required to attend schools can get a direct report from headmasters or principals, and thus see the weaknesses of their kid. Face-to-face communication with administration is much better compared to receiving a written note or email. Parents will take this information into account and help their child at enriching their knowledge.

In light of the above I can conclude that any parent is ought to volunteer time to childrens' school. It gives ^{an} opportunity to see the school inside out and ~~have~~ talk to those responsible for education. Not to mention, ~~your~~ children will be forever grateful if ~~you~~ ^{of parents} show interest in their life.

Nowadays many students face such a widespread problem of choosing a university major. There is an opinion that a choice of a field of study should be based on the availability of jobs in that field. To my mind, I find myself concurring with the above mentioned point of view as in the future students' income will depend on the availability and popularity of their jobs.

To begin with, every university student is determined to find a well-paid job, therefore it is of the utmost importance for them to keep track of the jobs that are in high demand. Even though pupils sometimes fail to meet certain demands for the desirable job, they should never give up no matter what. Moreover, it is essential to aim the preferences about future career at the current status quo on the labour market in order to maintain the society's sustainability. Some professions can prevail over others in the quantity of workers, consequently, the economy of the country worsens. Hence, it is highly important to strike a balance between all the available jobs in terms of the quantity of employed. Last but not least, sophisticated modern technologies ^{have} made some professions outdated and no longer available, thus, students should take into account all the pros and cons of a particular job, while choosing a major.

All points considered, students' choice of a university field will lead them to certain negative or positive consequences. At any rate, it is up to pupils to decide on their future career, but the availability of jobs in the field will help them to make this decision correctly.

„If a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable” - the claim argues. In this response I intend to dispute the validity of this statement to the best of my ability and provide my opinion on the matter.

Firstly, the most common argument for the ends always justifying the means is the notion that some sort of „greater good” will be reached and retrospectively make all the „questionable” methods worth it. The problem with this, though, is that said „greater good” is only the subjective goal as perceived by an individual, who seeks to impose their definition of „right and wrong” on others without giving them a say in the matter. Thus the means taken always end up being in favour of the abstract good, which is prioritised over the lives of actual, real people.

Secondly, I believe that this statement can be easily manipulated to justify almost anything. What goal can be considered „worthy” differs widely between the different people and any aim can be justified as being worthy if the speaker is a gifted enough orator who picks the right words. The vagueness of the claim, without the intent of the author, I believe, makes it possible for it to be used in defence of almost anything.

Ultimately, the question of ends justifying the means is as old as humanity and a lot of people far smarter than me have argued both for and against it. Still, I stand by my position: even if a goal is worthy, ~~any~~ all methods of reaching it are not automatically justified.

Should university students base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field? This is an important question, as it is, basically, a choice between your own wishes and your future comfort. On one hand, the idea of landing a position for your dream job sounds like an essential component of a good life. On another, there wouldn't be any point in studying for a job that you, most likely, will never get. As for me, I believe that the availability of jobs in your chosen field is a crucial factor.

There is a lot of arguments to support my position, the first ~~factor~~^{one} being that people wouldn't be able to enjoy their desired job if they ~~don~~ aren't able to find one. After leaving university, most students are in need of full-time jobs. If the field has a lot of vacancies, it would be easier to locate ~~a~~ your first ever workplace.

The second argument is that fields with more jobs available have less competition. Such fields are usually new and require^{more} people to develop further, which allows ~~both~~ ~~even~~ the graduated to find a vacancy just for them, while also giving enough time to master the needed skills. The areas with less "free" job positions are likely to have higher standards for newcomers, making them much less suitable for people, who still need time to adjust, and raising the possibility of being fired for not keeping up.

To sum up, it's much easier to find a job if there's a lot available, so it would be logical to consider this factor while choosing the field to study. You can always learn new skills and get ^{the} education^{required} for your dream job, so it's better to prioritize stability over personal wishes.

I disagree with the statement that university students should base their choice of field of study on the availability of jobs in that field. Of course, availability of jobs in the sector is an important factor, when choosing a job, but it definitely shouldn't be the main factor.

I think that the ultimate factor when it comes to finding a job is whether you like it or not, whether the job brings you happiness or discontent. For instance, let's imagine a situation where a man, let's name him Bob, picks a job that's highly available, but doesn't bring him pleasure. Sure, it will be easy for Bob to find a work ~~place~~ place and start working right away. But what point would there be in getting the job quickly if he doesn't like it anyway? We are left with an employed, but unsatisfied Bob, whose life is sad, maybe even miserable. Now let's imagine a situation where Bob picks a less, maybe even much less ~~at~~ available job, but one that brings him happiness. Sure, Bob might not find a job right away. But he won't stop - he is driven by his desire to get a job that he likes. And, sooner or later, I'm sure Bob will find an opportunity. What are we left with? ~~But~~ An employed and happy Bob, who enjoys going to work each day, and thus not only is happier himself, but also is much more productive at work, bringing him more income.

Bob was obviously just a silly example. A person looking for a ~~job~~ low-availability job that they like ~~xxx~~ is sure to face many struggles and hardships. But I'm sure that if they love a specific discipline enough, they will find a job, no matter the ~~xxxxxx~~ obstacles they face.

By hook or by crook: is the goal worthy?

For ages people have been arguing whether any means taken are justifiable if a goal is worthy. Some claim that there are no bad means if they can help to reach the desired result as the consequences of not taking extreme measures might lead to ^{the} even worse outcome.

However, I think that there are some boundaries that cannot be overstepped even for the greater good.

There a lot of examples that prove my point, for instance, in history. Take Stalin, the leader of the USSR, who wanted to establish communism. In attempts to reach his goal he combated the opposition and those with different views. This resulted in more than a million of deaths of innocent citizens. To some extent, Stalin managed to impose the regime, but after his own death he was perceived as a villain. There is always the other side of the coin, thus, if you use violence as your means of reaching your goals, once it will affect you too.

Another controversial way of achieving what one wants is by cheating. The most notorious example of it is the Watergate scandal. Nixon, the president of the USA, tried to win the elections by stealing information about his opponent, but his agents were caught red-handed. Before this he was a respectable politician, but ended up almost losing everything because of his lust for his win. It is important to remember that truth always comes to light, and what you might lose may be greater than what you gain.

Summing up, the moral code exists for a reason and we should not treat it as something minor just because our 'goal is worthy'.

The question of whether university ~~students~~ students should base their choice of a field of ~~study~~ ^{study} on the availability of jobs in that field has been widely discussed for the past few decades. While some people see this way of making a final decision ~~on~~ on one's education path rational, I strongly disagree with it.

First of all, choosing a field of study based on current employment statistics is not as safe as it seems. ~~The~~ Economy in ^{the} modern world is ~~an~~ inconsistent ~~system~~ because of its dependence on many political and cultural factors. Therefore, an industry with the most job offers at a certain moment might completely disappear ~~in~~ within a couple years. For example, the production rate of vinyl albums has significantly lowered since the invention of ~~cassettes~~ ^{cassettes}, while cassettes are also almost absent now due to invention of MP3 players and ~~smartphones~~ smartphones. This shows that even the strongest industry might disappear, causing people to lose ~~their~~ their jobs, which makes choosing a field of study ~~the~~ solely based on current ~~employment~~ amount of job offers irrational.

Moreover, if all people start getting education based on ^{the} ~~a~~ profit they could make, science and economy itself will stop in ^{their} ~~its~~ development and progress. Many tend to think that in our days the most perspective field is IT. However, they forget that its creation has happened mainly thanks to those who devoted their lives to maths and physics. The point I'm trying to make is that the desire of profit will not change the world for the better, but would cause its stagnation and even regress. It means that ~~the~~ education choices should be made with the intention to ~~gain~~ gain knowledge in a field you are truly interested in, not the one ~~which~~ ^{that} would provide you with a job with 6-digit salary.

To sum up, I'd like to state that while I can understand why ^{students} some choose ~~a~~ what university degree to get based on how many job offers are ^{available} in that field, I do not approve ~~of~~ such decisions as ~~they~~ ^{they} ~~remain~~ remaining to be ~~the~~ risky and only bring short-term personal ~~profit~~ profit, but not universal well-being which world should aim for.

Undoubtedly, patience, hard work and talent play an important role in making a scientific discovery. Besides that, luck is also essential to accomplish a major breakthrough, as sometimes the researcher has to be in the right place and in the right time.

For example, antibiotics are among the most famous accidental discoveries. They were found by Alexander Fleming, a microbiologist, who studied harmful bacteria. While leaving on holiday, he forgot to empty one of his petri cups, and left it ~~is~~ outside the fridge. To his surprise, when he returned, all the bacteria were killed by a green mold that had escaped the upper lab. After careful research, Fleming succeeded in extracting the cure that helped save countless lives since the ~~twentieth~~ century.

Microwave oven was also constructed due to a complete luck. Once, a scientist, who worked on developing the radar technology, took a chocolate bar with him into the lab, intending to have a snack during the work. Having forgotten about the snack, he attended an experiment and was exposed to the microwave signal. When he was leaving the room, he remembered to consume the chocolate, but found out that it had melted inside ^{intended} of his pocket. He got interested in this phenomena and conducted a series ~~of~~ few experiments, that gave him an idea to create ~~an over~~ a new type of ovens. After a number of attempts, he created the appli~~can~~ appliance that heavily assists us in our everyday lives.

In conclusion, I would like to say that accidents and luck have a huge impact on scientific development of the humanity, and ~~even though~~ ^{yet} their roles are not leading, ~~they~~ ^{they} are really significant.

Many people faced the challenge of deciding on something important which would include making some sacrifices. Personally, I think that if a goal is worthy then all means are justifiable. To add more, goals are set to be achieved. It is no wonder that to get something, one has to give something in return.

It goes without saying that when making a choice one should foresee all consequences of it. Some goals require time and energy, some require money or different resources. It is essential to scale one's possibility to attain something with minimal effect or damage on his or her spheres of life.

One problem that may arise ~~is~~ concerns one's moral. Sometimes the goals are so desirable that one starts to question his or her ^{principals} beliefs, and if to sacrifice them. In my opinion, the goal itself should be made without including to violate one's principles of life. This way a person would not need ~~a~~ to suffer afterwards. This problem often includes whether

~~If~~ ~~a~~ ~~per~~ or not to damage one's relationship or reputation.

If a person only speaks about doing something but does ~~ex~~ except working for it, the goal melts down into a dream fastly. Hence, some effort lies in the foundation of attaining the goal.

To conclude
~~In conclusion~~, a worthy goal requires means and they are ~~of~~ justifiable if one sets their aim properly without having to interfere his or her moral code. Also it is essential to calculate your moves in order to get something by receiving minimal damage. All things considered, goals are not dreams and that is why work is needed upon oneself.

Nowadays, it is a very disputable issue whether taking any means to achieve your goal is justifiable. While some people believe that it is not worth it, I am inclined to believe that if it is a life-altering goal, you should use all possible resources in order to attain it.

To support this point, it would not be extra to say that by accomplishing a goal, people get a lot of useful skills and experience, which would be invaluable in the future. In process of preparing to achieve a goal, ~~learn new things~~, people learn new things, ~~expand~~ their knowledge in a particular subject and become much more independent, especially, if the achievement is connected with studying. Furthermore, using all possible means for preparation would enhance the chances of successful accomplishment.

Secondly, there are no reasons of not using all possible resources unless they are somehow connected with cheating or deceiving others. People use all kinds of means in order to achieve their small, daily goals on everyday basis and there is nothing wrong about it. ~~However~~ However, ~~if~~ if the means that you use overlap with interests or requirements of others, it is likely to have some adverse consequences. Thus, should you want to watch an educational video as ~~part~~ a part of preparation, for example, make sure that it does not ~~inter~~ distract others by the loudness of the video.

To conclude, it is worth restating that it is completely fine to attain a goal using all kinds of resources. However, those resources should not ~~consist~~ consist of deceiving, cheating, or interrupting others. If they do not, then feel free to accomplish your goals.

Philosophical saying "If a goal is worthy then any means taken to attain it are justifiable" still maintains a discussion whether it is true or not. In my opinion, saying is mostly true.

Analyzing history of humanity it can be determined that almost every key invention or breakthrough required some kind of sacrifices. Great example of this is nuclear power. Nuclear powerplants are safe, extremely efficient and above all actually eco-friendly. However a lot of people died from radiation poisoning during first tests and not only the scientists died but also miners and workers who provided uranium for centrifuges to create fuel rods. All of them sacrificed their lives in order to introduce nuclear powerplants, thus, saving many more lives by providing people with safe and clean energy.

However not every goal is worth its cost. Infamous Adolf Hitler wanted to create a new world order where only few people would govern over all.

He utilized inhumane doctrines like carpet bombing, committed genocide, established ~~the~~ labour camps ~~where~~ where people worked to death and that's only fraction of all atrocities that he ~~was~~ committed. In my opinion, ~~the~~ never had humanity ever been so close to it's collapse as in 1941.

In conclusion I would say that ~~the~~ it is very important to responsibly evaluate every goal and clearly understand whether it is really worthy or not, thus creating a better world through accomplishing worthy goals and stopping maniacs such as Adolf Hitler. If such people will be stopped at the beginning, this saying will bring more good than bad to our society.

THE PRICE OF THE GOAL

Amidst the ever-evolving discourse whether a benevolent aim's outcomes can cover any means taken, there is a rise in opinion that it is more than acceptable. In this response I am going to elucidate why I see eye to eye with such a controversial trend.

The 21st century has brought up the generation of highly motivated people, constantly trying to outperform one another. If we impose harsh restrictions on their actions, there is an increased likelihood that they will not follow their passions and will abandon the ideas, which are capable of revolutionising the entire world. Furthermore, by enabling those unrecognised geniuses to go beyond the limit of commonly ^{accepted} rules, we will create a foundation for alleviating world-scale problems. Consequently, the ^{exact} measures taken to achieve the elimination of poverty or famine will be not so vital in the long run.

Nevertheless, there are also individuals who are strongly at odds with such a viewpoint. Not only will ~~rise~~ social instability ^{rise} but also chaos will take over the world, in their opinion. They are prone to believe that everything must be based on the moral values. Even though such beliefs hold water, I genuinely reckon that living in fear has no prospects for us ~~more~~ evolving. Apart from that, I have a question to challenge their perception of the issue. What if their child ~~was~~ had cancer, and they could save him/her by sacrificing the lives of others. Would they allow his pain or continue looking at his sufferings? Every parent knows the answer, thereby, humanism is not the aspect we should rely on in terms of worthy goals.

On balance, had it not been for revolutionising ideas, we would have never lived in the modern world. Making sacrifices is the only solution to keep the ongoing trend of progressing.

Today there is a plenty of opinions whether any means taken to attain a worthy goal are justifiable. Some people reckon that a person should always seize the opportunity to accomplish their aim because even the smallest thing may play a vital role, so each step is sensible if it relates to one's significant goal. ^{which can have a profound impact on one's life.} Their adversaries believe that all measures taken to achieve something ~~unreasonable~~ should be ~~thought out~~ ^{thought out}, otherwise a person may face negative repercussions. In this response I am going to describe these points of view and give my opinion on the subject.

Starting with the first ~~point of view~~ ^{one}, it is beneficial indeed to try out all possible chances to accomplish one's goal. All of them will be justifiable, as nobody knows which of them is workable. Besides, ~~therefore~~ people can learn various life lessons by trial and error. Even almost unnoticeable action can lead a person to a desirable outcome, so it always ~~works~~ ^{useful to push one's luck.}

On the other hand, people should also understand that they are accountable for ~~themselves~~ themselves, so it is necessary to respect other people while achieving one's wishes. The thing is that a person may lose mind and start doing awful deeds, even not paying much attention to them, as he or she is fully concentrated on their life and thoughts.

To sum up, I support the fact that not all means taken to attain a worthy goal are justifiable. First and foremost, we are all people, so we should always take into account the moral rules and not forget about other's lives, trying to achieve desirable things. Secondly, a person should be able to think critically ^{and} take measures consciously not to waste one's time and resources.

~~The~~ The notion that "if a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justified" presents a complex moral dilemma that merits rigorous examination. At first glance, this assertion appears compelling; noble objectives such as social justice, environmental sustainability, and humanitarian aid can inspire individuals to adopt extreme measures. However, the ethical implications of such a stance necessitate a more nuanced exploration, as the means employed can significantly alter the integrity of the intended outcome.

To begin with, history is replete with examples where ostensibly virtuous goals have been undermined by the methods employed to achieve them. The pursuit of political freedom has often been marred by violence and oppression, leading to the paradoxical situation where liberation movements devolve into tyranny. Such instances underscore means in the name of a worthy end; the original goal hollow and counterproductive.

Moreover, the justification of means based solely on the perceived worthiness of a goal raises significant concerns regarding moral relativism. If individuals are permitted to rationalize unethical actions for what they deem noble purposes, a slippery slope emerges. This perspective risks normalizing harmful behaviors and ending societal standards of conduct, ultimately jeopardizing the very values that underpin the worthy goals themselves.

In conclusion, while the aspiration to achieve noble objectives is undeniably commendable, it is imperative to critically evaluate the means employed in their pursuit. Ethical integrity must remain paramount; otherwise, the very essence of the goal may be compromised. Thus, a balanced approach that harmonizes ambition with ethical considerations is essential for fostering genuine progress in society.

The choice of a field of study is a concerning issue for university students. ~~There~~ Sad stories of unemployed undergraduates abound the society and make young people anxious about their future. There's a point of view that they should base their choice of a field to study on the availability of jobs in that field.

I strongly disagree with that point and I consider that students should base their career choices on their talents. First of all, you are unlikely to graduate university when pursuing an unwanted occupation. It's extremely dull to study something you don't truly enjoy. Secondly, the job market can change easily so you need to get a wide range of skills; both hard and soft ones. Self-studying is your best friend when it comes to getting relevant qualifications because your university professors can't teach you anything if you're unwilling to study on your own. Frankly, the field of study doesn't really matter to interviewers and recruiters. On the opposite, your work experience plays a significant role when they make a decision whether to hire you or not. That's why you should follow a saying "the more, the merrier" while choosing interesting projects to participate in or part-time jobs to get. ~~Yes~~ It's understandable that a lot of students choose easy part-time jobs such as a servant or a barista but you should choose them strategically, according to your skills and preferences. To add to this taking intellectually challenging hobbies, for ~~example~~ example, studying languages, blogging or programming will certainly improve your resume.

The world offers you a vast amount of possibilities to succeed, and it's evident that everything doesn't depend on the availability of jobs in a certain field. If you have a true passion to do something, you will achieve success no matter what, and even if you do not, your hard work, ~~intellect and talent~~ thorough studying something you enjoy doing and determination will eventually pay off.

It is a common misconception that ~~many~~ many discoveries or inventions were created by accident. From my perspective, this is completely untrue. Even though it is believed that Newton, for example, understood how gravity works when an apple fell on his head, most of the important discoveries were made after a long time of work and research. Significant ideas certainly can not be created while looking for something else, ~~but~~ because it should be studied thoroughly by itself.

~~First~~ First of all, when a person wants to answer a certain challenging question, they should do a lot of research and maybe even ~~perform~~ perform some experiments or surveys to find a general pattern. ~~For~~ for instance, discoveries that have shaped the modern world like the discovery of an atom or the creation of a spaceship were made only after years of studies and certainly not by accident.

Secondly, when people research a certain subject or a question they might also find ~~an answer~~ ^{something new} ~~about a connected topic,~~ ^{about a connected topic,} but that is rather a rare occurrence than a general rule. That is because every topic should be researched by itself, because when it comes to different topics in a subject some factors might not be necessary, therefore not considered when researching a topic, but they might be essential, when ~~answering~~ researching another question and can significantly alter the results.

To conclude, it is generally untrue that most significant discoveries were ~~made~~ accidental. When a person ~~what~~ wants to address an important question they might require a lot of time to find the answer

due to the necessity of an in-depth research and consideration of various factors that can affect the results and ~~the~~ lead people to have false conclusions.

Justifying any means taken to attain a worthy goal is a statement that requires a serious consideration. In this essay I will express my opinion on this topic and argument it.

It goes without saying that to achieve something great it is essential to be ready to take a risk. You will not succeed without trying. For example, a russian scientist Mikhail Lomonosov, who was born in a poor family, made a courageous decision and walked all the way to Moscow from his province. He could have died on the way or in the city itself because of his poor background and no money to his name but he did not. The ~~man~~ man was academically talented which helped him to earn a great position in life. His goal - to study - was really worthy, so all the risks Lomonosov took on his way to it are very understandable.

However, there is a counter-argument that should not go unnoticed. During World War ~~Two~~ II Hitler's plan was to conquer as much land as possible. Surely, looking from the government's perspective this is a great goal as every country cares about its territory and wishes to expand it. But in that specific situation, the means that were taken to achieve the goal should never be not judged. The amount of people that died because of Hitler's methods is tragic. Therefore, no matter what the goal is, it could never be justified if caused sacrifices or any pain to human kind.

In conclusion, any ways taken to reach the desired goal could be understood as long as they do not endanger other's lives.

Ultimately, I believe that all the actions might be justified for a good reason, unless they bring harm to the society.

Are all means justifiable for a worthy cause?
Every day thousands of people are faced with this dilemma. Whether it be at work, contemplating how ethical or not it would be to complain about a coworker to get the raise you desperately need instead of them, or at school, sabotaging someone else's relationship with the teacher to get them to view you more favourably. The question presented is: Should you do it? Is it ~~justified~~ justified?

I think not. I think that community and unity within it is the most important aspect of our society. Without unity we are nothing, but together we are capable and strong. You are not alone in this world, there will be people willing to help and support you. Let them. Support others instead of making them into stepping stones for your goal. Making enemies is far easier that way.

Some people may find peace of mind in "healthy selfishness". But it is a mere excuse. We are not meant to live in solidarity.

By being uncaring and cruel to the people ~~around~~ around us we create an even more cruel and difficult to navigate world. ~~Where~~ ~~At~~ A world where no amount of betrayal will earn you anything. A world where no one wins. Healthy selfishness is, like anything else, only healthy in moderation. The connections we build are a lot more important than immediately getting your way in life. The future is uncertain and every action you take affects it. You should always consider how it will affect the people you choose to keep close.

You can never be sure which goal will pay off in the end, but having people who are around to ~~eg~~ support you will help no matter what others say. Don't give that up for some goal you seemed worthy. Because community is all we have.

Many students often wonder, what should they study? Not all fields have a lot of jobs to offer. Should they choose a field of study that they like or a field that can give them a job?

I think that if you are picking a field, choose the one that calls to you.

Firstly, if you decide to choose something that can give you a high paying job, even though those courses are incredibly difficult for you to understand, you will not acquire any lasting knowledge and it will be a gigantic waste of time.

Secondly, many people who work in those fields probably do not have a job that is using their knowledge fully. You can have a Master's Degree in engineering and the job you have is screwing on bottle caps in some factory. It can be mindnumbing at best and syisifician at worst.

Finally, if all people studied what gave a better job, many of today's great works of art and literature would not be around today. Mark Twain, Charles Dickens — all of them would have been making something ordinary and their names would be lost to history.

In conclusion, you should not just pick a field of study looking only at the availability of jobs that field offers. If you do, you may not be taken for what you really are. However, if you choose something that you are actually passionate about, then you might create something the world may have never seen before and ~~would here not~~ if you had studied the most popular thing.

It is in human nature to wish more for himself. The range of people's desires can vary from eating at least something and improving working environment to luxurious yachts, expensive cars and enormous mansions. Therefore a question arises: "If the aim is worthy, then any means that the person takes could be justified?"

Personally, I strongly disagree with this point of view, because ^{morality is} above any goals and ambitions. ~~I wonder what kind of world would it be~~ Unfortunately, there are a lot of people, that are willing to ^{destroy} ~~neglect~~ other's lives in order to achieve what they want. In theory almost every ideology implies good ~~moti~~ living and happiness to people, however in practise they are devastating and working in detriment to people. That's why richest capitalists deceive masses for money. The same thing the most affluent communists do. ^{Moreover} Sadly, the aforementioned statement works in lives of ordinary people. Scientists, like, for example, Thomas Edison are capable of stealing other scientists' research developments and discoveries. Careerists, as a rule, tend to walk on heads in order to get a promotion or have their salary risen. It is a common wisdom that careerists tell in on their colleagues and ^{trick} ~~know~~ their bosses into believing them. Luckily, most of them get fired, but the negative impact has already been made.

With all the ~~Re~~mentioned said, I shall conclude, that the goal does not justify the method of achieving it, because whether you are a capitalist, ^acommunist, ^aresearcher or an office worker your aspirations are not worthwhile in case they bring suffering to others

It goes without saying that if one's motivation to achieve a certain goal is strong enough, one will do anything to attain it. However, one should always remember to have human decency. Some methods of achieving a goal are simply too brute and cruel to be justifiable. There are several instances of how one should not forget about empathy, compassion and basic human decency while attempting to achieve a certain goal. Otherwise, a great price will be paid.

First and foremost, I would like to say that no matter how worthy one's goal is, it does not justify murder or any harm done to others. One of the most sensational Japanese animation series "Death Note" is an incredible example of how God complex and doing things, at the first glance, for the sake of justice can ~~be~~ drive a person crazy and make him a criminal. The main character of the series Light Yagami uses the Death Note, functions of which are self-explanatory, to fight criminal activity in Japan by killing criminals. His goal was to attain a perfect ~~society~~ society and him becoming a hero. Contrary to what he expected, Light loses his mind, becomes a serial killer and later is captured and executed by the police.

Another example can be obtained through ~~the~~ World history. A dictator, fascist and just a monster Adolf Hitler is responsible for ~~the~~ hundreds millions of deaths. Those include innocent civilians, women and children. His goal of achieving a "clean" society seemed reasonable to ~~the~~ Hitler and his followers. Committing mass genocide, however, is clearly not a justifiable method to attain a goal. Being this radical is not a way out for any politician.

In conclusion, I would like to say that no matter how worthy a goal is, such means as murder, causing harm to others, human rights violations, verbal or physical abuse cannot seek justification whatsoever.

In today's world, almost every person goes to school and becomes a student when he turns six. The education in school lasts about eleven or twelve years, depending on ~~the~~ a country, which is a significant period of time ~~of~~ for human's development. Without doubt, school plays a big role in a ~~life~~ life of every person. ~~Parents~~ Parental role is also quite important. ~~Their~~ The contribution of parents to schools can significantly improve the quality of children's education. However, some parents avoid volunteering time to their children's studies. I ~~disapprove~~ disagree with such attitude as I strongly believe that their help would be of utmost importance. Moreover, I think that parents are required to volunteer time to their children's schools.

To explain the importance of parental contribution to schools, ~~I'd like~~ I would like to provide examples of good influence, ~~whi~~ that parents can have on children's education. ~~Student~~ Firstly, students spend most of their time studying in a school building. Sometimes, these buildings can be rather old-fashioned and even dangerous for children's health. Parents, who want security and comfort for their children, can propose plans on how to improve the conditions and even provide school with some financial support. Secondly, parents can fight for justice regarding children's marks. ~~Students~~ Often, students can't oppose strict teachers,

But their parents can talk to them and defend the position of their children.

Thus, parents can have positive influence on children's education by volunteering a bit of their time to schools. Their contribution to educational conditions can help students study better and stay secured ~~even~~ outside their home.

Creative writing - Topic № 1

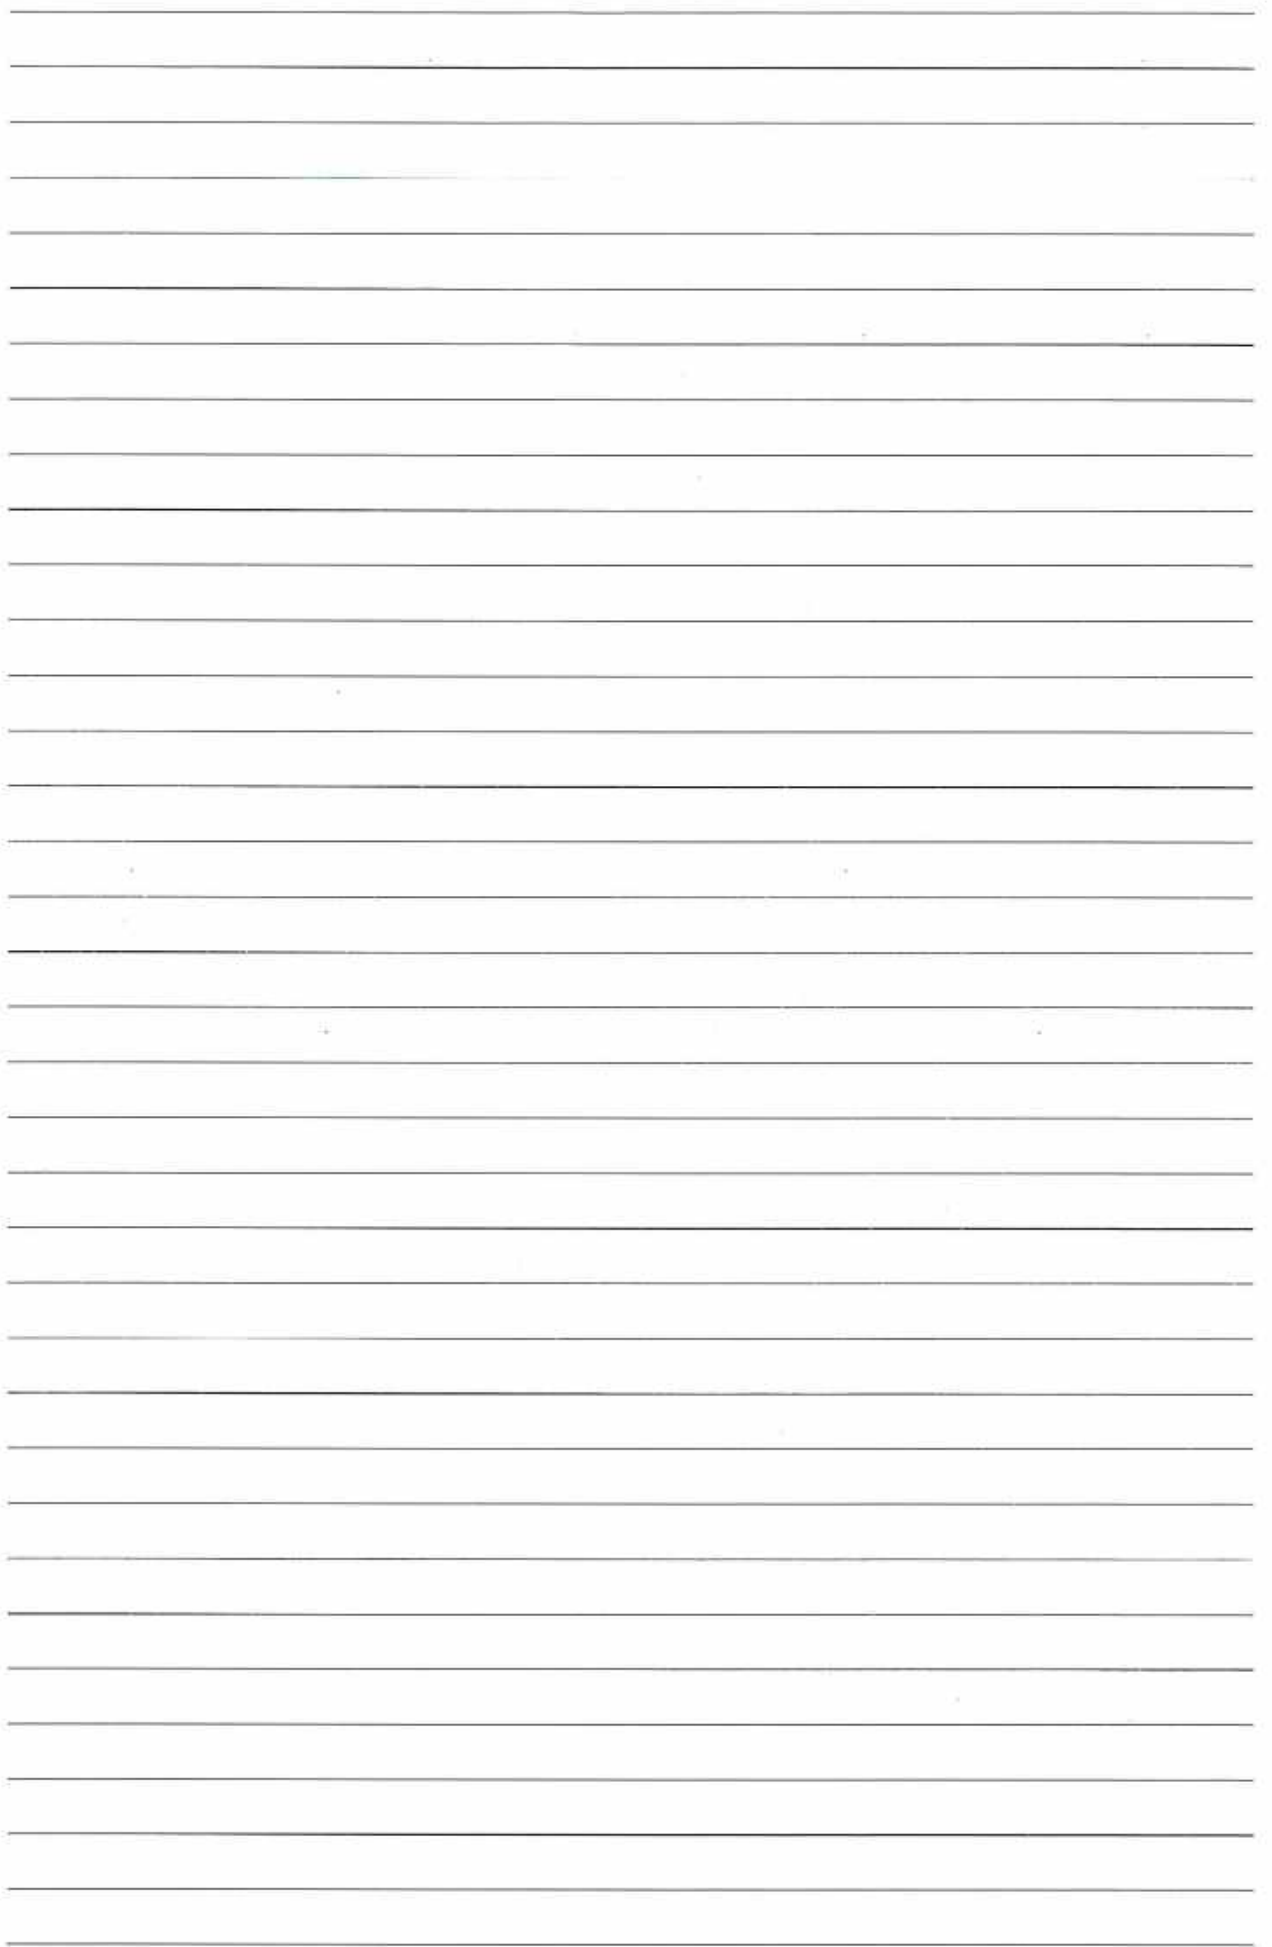

With the rise of new fields of study the topic of education is ~~highly dis~~ has become especially controversial. Highschoolers wonder if they should base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field. In my opinion, it is better to rely on the student's hobbies and interests.

First of all, it is vital to recognise that education is a long process. Getting a Bachelor's Degree takes ~~about four~~ conservatively four years of hard work. In this time the situation on the job market ~~may~~ might ~~have~~ change significantly. If a student chose the field of study purely out of job availability ~~and~~ without any interest in it, he or she is more likely to give up before the graduation. In result, this person might end up paying their educational debt without any kind of diploma in hands.

Secondly, the job market ~~is~~ is constantly changing. ~~Any~~ Every scientific development or discovery might lead to substantial changes in the market. While professionals are capable of partially predicting the trends, most highschoolers lack the education and experience to do so. This means that the job market might ^{have} changed multiple times by the time a student graduates.

Some people argue that it is harder to be employed with certain diplomas such as liberal arts. However, I disagree with this opinion. Even if there is a lack of jobs in the field, a high percentage of employers provide additional education for their workers. This means that for many job positions one's initial choice of a field does not play a significant role.

In conclusion, I would like to recommend choosing the field of study based on ~~your~~ one's interests rather than the availability of jobs in the market. This way the time spent in the university will bring much more joy and pleasure.

Nowadays people share the opinion that university students should choose a field of study, considering the availability of jobs in that field. ~~Some~~ But is it ~~really~~ relevant in the modern world?

As for me, it is the right opinion to have. In today's world, to live comfortably one should do something to earn money. No doubt that people should also consider what they enjoy doing.

As for me, it is the right opinion to have. There is no doubt that one should consider what they enjoy doing, ^(when choosing what to study) but in today's world a person should do what is needed in the employment field to live comfortably. If a student ~~learns the disciplines which will help them in their future~~ ^{subjects} understands what our society needs and opts for the discipline that satisfies this need, they will be able to do what they love in their free time without constantly ~~that~~ thinking how to survive.

What is also to be considered is that if a ^{student} person chooses the field where which is "overcrowded", they will need to work ~~extra hours~~ ^{a lot of} extra hours in order to become a specialist ^{needed} specialist. For instance, there is a number of people ^{short} ~~which~~ go to the university to ^{become} ~~be~~ ^{journalists} ~~the~~ ^{become} ~~journalists~~. Nowadays there is a huge number there are lots of reporters and those who have only started studying will need to spend years to become a significant one.

To conclude, ~~students~~ ^{students} should opt for the studies that will be able to give them jobs because then they will have an opportunity to ~~earn their own~~ ^{earn their own} have different types of hobbies and satisfy their ~~own~~ ^{own} needs.

Another argument is that by ~~having a~~ doing this choice students will be able not only to satisfy their own needs, but also to help their families. People may ^(in the future) ~~provide~~ ^{make, provide} their parents ~~a~~ ^{trip} for their parents ~~to~~ ^{with} a trip and may also give their ^{future} children presents.

To conclude, students should opt for the studies that ~~pe~~

I will write a response for Topic 1 as it seems to have a broader and more universal appeal. Here's my response:

University students should base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field.

I strongly agree with the idea that university students should base their availability of jobs in that field. This make informed decisions about their future careers and more likely to secure stable employment upon graduation.

Creative writing - Topic No 1

One of the most important decisions that a person has to make in their life is probably to choose a certain field in tertiary education. Naturally, this is a popular topic of discussion and people's opinions seem to differ on one aspect seem to differ, with some believing that it is more relevant to choose a sphere in studying based on the accessibility of possible job options, and others expressing the need for a student to decide based on their personal preferences and interests. Personally, I tend to resonate with the latter view more.

Firstly, it is a well-known fact that it is important for one to choose that field of study, which he/she genuinely enjoys. This way, their learning process would be not only educational, but also more fruitful and interesting. Secondly, in today's world there is a visible tendency for young people to study more than one subject at once and to continue education incessantly. This is largely due to a fact that it prevents them from facing a lack of job opportunities and making increasing their chances of getting a higher position in a competitive work field in the future.

Yet, at the same time, the opposite opinion on the same topic still remains relevant. Undoubtedly, there are now certain working spheres, where there is a lack of specialists prominent as well as others, where there are too many of them. Hence, one must choose that study and working field, where they wouldn't have to face harsh ^{competition} competitiveness. Additionally, more and more students who have just finished studying at a college or university fail to find a profitable and sustainable job, simply because it is unpopular and doesn't provide a good income.

In conclusion, ^{for students} I would say that it is of more importance to choose ~~as before~~ what to study based on what they find pleasurable and interesting, what excites them. Nevertheless, it is still important to consider such study fields, that would prepare them to be competent and competitive in future work fields.

If a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable.

If a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable. Actually, I agree with this claim.

I always try to do everything to reach a goal that I have. I had many situations in my life, when this position saved me.

For example, when I was 15, I had to take my OGE exam. ~~My~~ I decided to take chemistry exam. My parents were against it, but I was sure that I would pass it. I studied much and I passed it. I got a five. My parents were very happy, though they didn't approve my choice in the beginning. This case shows that my point of view on this point helped me.

Unfortunately, this point of view can sometimes be not the right one and can harm somebody. For example, I want to take a case in a football match as an example. Liverpool played against Real Madrid. It was a final of a champions league. Liverpool had a very strong player. His name was Salah. Real knew it and their player Serhio Ramos broke Salah's arm during the match. Many people say that ~~it~~ was accidentally. But I am sure it wasn't. This way, Salah had to leave the match and Liverpool lost. This case shows that ~~the point of view~~ that it ~~appeal~~ is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable. Liverpool reached it's goal.

In conclusion I want to say that you always should think what your goal worthes. But if you are sure that it is important for you, do everything to reach it.

I firmly agree that all parents should be required to volunteer time to their children's schools. This requirement can significantly enhance the educational experience for both students and parents, fostering a stronger sense of community and involvement in the learning process.

First and foremost, parental involvement has been shown to positively impact student achievement. When parents participate in school activities, they demonstrate to their children the importance of education. This engagement can lead to improved academic performance, better behavior, and higher graduation rates. Schools thrive when parents are actively involved, as they bring diverse skills and perspectives to the table, enriching the educational environment. Additionally, volunteering fosters a closer relationship between parents and teachers. When parents are present in the schools, they gain firsthand insight into the curriculum and teaching methods, which allows them to support their children at home more effectively. This collaboration can bridge the gap between home and school, creating a cohesive support system for students.

Some may argue that requiring parents to volunteer could place an undue burden on those with demanding jobs or other responsibilities. However, schools can offer flexible volunteering options, allowing parents to contribute in ways that suit their schedules. Moreover, embracing a culture of shared responsibility for education can significantly empower parents, encouraging them to prioritize their involvement in ways that benefit their children.

In conclusion, mandating parental volunteerism in schools can lead to a multitude of benefits, including enhanced student performance, stronger parent-teacher relationships, and a more vibrant school community. By requiring parental involvement, we invest not only in our children's education but also in the collective growth of our society.

There is not denying that wheather the means to the end, whatever they might be, have almost always been a topic of heated arguments. Many people all over the world feel that success is always earned the hard way. I'm going to write a response with ~~my~~ discuss the claim wheather the any means taken to attain the goal are justifiable if a goal is worthy.

To begin with, people who are willing to do everything in their power to achieve their goal often give up something important to them, may it be time spent with their nearests and dearests or much needed rest, that is crucial to their physical and mental health. Furthermore, sometimes to achieve fame, ^{and} glory or earn money people are ready to throw anyone who crosses their way under the bus, break the law or refrain from focusing on anything besides their work.

On the other hand, being confident in one's ability to make a difference can be considered admirable. Work-driven people often stress that all struggles they came through along the way were worth it in the end. Besides, dealing with challenges only makes us stronger and durable to stress. It is often proclaimed that the ~~relationships~~ ~~perhaps~~ ~~as~~ relationships can be mended, but the opportunity to satisfy one's ambitious nature can no longer present itself.

In conclusion, one needs to mull over the goal and their willingness to do everything to achieve it, considering the consequences ~~a~~ their actions may have in the long run. In ~~my~~ my point of view, it's better to give up one thing, such as, for example, becoming the employee of the month, than lose the interpersonal ~~ties~~ ties with the people around.

Nowadays, job market is abundant with options of ~~proffer~~^{various} professions and university students face a ~~hard~~^{difficult} problem: which field of study to choose? ^{to get a better} Most of them tend to rely on the assumption that this decision should be made based Nowadays job market is abundant with options of various professions and university students face a difficult problem: which field of study to choose to get a better career? Most of them ~~that~~ tend to rely on the assumption that this decision should be ~~based on~~ made based on the availability of jobs in their field. But I believe it's not the ~~only~~ ~~criterion we should pay our atten~~ most important criterion.

To begin with, as many people desire to work in a ~~populair~~^{popular} field, ~~it brings~~ ~~makes~~ ambitious students should prepare for a strong competition. ^{For instance,} If you want to achieve huge success, make a lot of money or even become famous, be aware of many rivals and mind that there are thousands or even millions of candidates who are always ready to take your place. This makes ~~it a~~ ~~it~~ getting a well-paid job more hard and those who seek easy ways should remember ~~that it can also lead to the~~ ~~situations when there are too many~~ ~~people wanting to~~ this drawback.

Most importantly, society needs all kinds of professions. Imagine, for example, that we only have doctors and ~~programmers~~ programmers. ~~in our world~~ Then who will write music, investigate crimes and even ~~manage~~ manage political crises? Although we don't need a lot of musicians, ~~invest~~ investigators and ~~our~~ politicians, our world would not be the ~~same~~ same without these ~~professions~~ jobs. The limited places ~~show it's hard~~ should not stop the students who truly ~~wanting~~ want to ~~contribute~~ work in this fields.

To conclude, I think that choosing a field of study is a complex decision that needs taking ~~into~~ a lot of factors into consideration. The availability of jobs is one of them, but it is absolutely not the ^{only} one that we should base our decision on ~~on~~ - it is essential to remember that it does not ~~guarantee~~ guarantee the success and, moreover, there are ^{many} ~~plenty~~ of ^{not so popular} professions that require specialists.

All parents should be required to volunteer time to their children's schools

Parents of our generation are more likely to show interest their children's activity, some of them even volunteering in schools. Spending your time at your children's schools should be a requirement, and there are good reasons for it to become one.

First of all, it is not common for parents to hire nannies to babysit their kids due to the lack of time. Those nannies are often seen as the main caregivers by children, leading to cold relationship between a child and a parent. Volunteering at schools will allow the family to spend time together, build and enhance their connection. It may also help to balance out and resolve disagreement between family members, as each of them are interacting in a positive environment.

Secondly, while devoting time to school volunteering, parents get a great chance to complete the activities together, resulting in starting new friendships with each other. Doing a group project, such as cooking in the cafeteria, allows ~~the~~ parents to communicate through a small talk or cooperate to reach the same goal - feed their children. Adults often are dealing with the lack of time resources and rarely socialize outside of the workplace, so volunteering can become a way to share opinions and evaluate on the topic of parenthood.

All in all, government should consider making school volunteering a requirement for parents. Family institution will only face improvements if guardians provide their resources to public or private schools, where their children are being educated. Not only will adults indulge into spending time with their kids, but also build a potential connection with others and raise their social scale. Overall, the effect of required volunteering will certainly be positive and helpful.

~~Introduction~~

In the modern world, few topics spark as much debate as the concept of goal worthiness and justifiable means to attain it. On the one hand, some argue that there are ~~some~~ ^{several} ~~situations~~ ^{situations} in which you don't need to think about the ~~means~~ ^{means} you use. But on the other hand, many believe that in ~~the~~ ^{the} reality, any means are justifiable. As for me, I strongly believe that ~~the~~ ^{the} society should know the limits of means which ~~they~~ ^{they} use to achieve their goals. ~~Sometimes~~ ^{the} the first and most important reason to support ~~my~~ ^{my} this point of view is ~~that~~ ^{the} the fact that you can harm other people ~~in the~~ ^{in the} ~~process~~ ^{process}.

This aspect cannot be underestimated as it plays a pivotal role. ~~is~~ Not only do you ~~can~~ ^{can} harm others but also ~~you~~ ^{now} you are have to live with such unpleasant situation and think about it over and over. That's exhausting...

~~Another reason to support this~~

Another point that deserves special attention is your mental health. It must be emphasized that while you are chasing your goal you must remember about your over-all mental state, stress level and daily routine. What makes this argument particularly strong is the fact that if you ~~be~~ ~~can~~ ~~overcome~~ it will be extremely complicated for you to continue chasing ~~a~~ your dream and main goal. You must ~~not~~ be aware of ~~your~~ ~~limits~~ your health limits. This argument leaves no doubts about the validity of the point.

To summarize, the advantages of renewing the limits ~~in~~ in the process of attaining your goal is far outweigh any ~~other~~ potential drawbacks. This essay has demonstrated why it is the best approach.

It is claimed that all parents should be required to volunteer time to their children's schools. Personally, I disagree with the statement, in spite of benefits its implementation could possibly give to the schools.

My main argument is that under no circumstances should volunteering be forced to the parents, given that it is opposite of definition of what a voluntary job is. As a result, it can lead to some difficult issues. For instance, the parents who do not want to volunteer but are forced to do this may not only reject to help, but maybe even sabotage the job for others. Furthermore, there is no need in parents to maintain the school, as they usually pay an essential sum of money, ^{to do so} which could, which could be used to hire staff for the school.

On the other hand, in some cases, such as exams, graduation, etc., parents' voluntary support might be helpful, as a lot of people are required for such events. Ultimately, volunteering can be used by parents as an opportunity to take part in lives of their offspring, owing to the fact that ^{they} they usually work until late night and do not have much time to communicate.

To sum up, volunteering by parents has a positive influence both on them and the school, but it should not be implemented by force. Instead, some actions should be done by the school to promote voluntary help.

There is a belief that university students should decide what field of study to choose based on availability of jobs in that field. Personally, I agree with this statement as I think that it will be more possible for such students to get the job and earn money for such students.

To begin with, students who base their choice of a study programme on availability of jobs in that sphere are usually more likely to find a place to work because they think about the employment question in advance. For instance, university students who choose ^{to study} medicine can be sure that there the job is available due to the lack of professional doctors in the society. Therefore, students who want to get a job without problems in the future ^{should} consider the availability and stability of the job, which means that they will always have money to live.

What is more, university students that base their choice of a field of study on the availability spend less time studying at university, as a rule, because they get the job after graduation and do not think about ~~not~~ choosing another field of study and getting second or even third education. Besides, such students are usually more qualified workers due to the fact that ^{they} develop in one sphere, in which the job is available; the availability of jobs means that these jobs professions are in need, are paid more and thus, guarantee successful future and stable life. ~~financial~~ earning of money.

In conclusion, I would like to say that it is necessary for university students to base their choice of a field of study on the availability of work in that field as they will not have problems with getting the job in the future and will spend less time studying and more time working. and so

One cannot deny that the education is one of the most significant parts of everyone's life. However, it is believed that undergraduates ought to choose professions where there are plenty of vacancies. As for me, I strongly disagree with this statement.

First of all, students should use their potential and try to exercise their abilities as far as it is possible. For example, if there ~~are~~^{is} the availability of ~~becoming~~^{being} philosophers, even practically every student will pick it. Of course, for this subject it will be beneficial, in comparison with other occupations, will not have ~~enough~~ that ~~with~~ which, in the future, will not have enough employees. Moreover, ~~people~~ if people base only on vacancies they will not enjoy their jobs and follow their dreams. Obviously, many students ~~will~~^{should} be unhappy due to the fact that they yielded their aims and dreams and just follow the majority to have the job in advance. Last but ~~not least~~^{even more}, hardly will we ~~get~~^{understand} that many ~~students~~ undergraduates will decide that ~~the~~ the already chosen field of study does not fit the modern world trends and, furthermore, they will not be able to find a job. Last but not least, ~~unlike~~ the universities, where out-dated and unuseful professions are taught will not have adequate amount of freshers and, unfortunately, they will close because of the shortage of money they get from the students. (On balance, the education is really meaningful for people's future career)

On balance, I believe that the education is really meaningful for people's future career and it is wrong to believe that students should choose the very occupation where ~~are~~^{there} a lot of variant of jobs. I suppose, people ~~do not~~^{person} ought to follow their dreams and pick that profession which they are really into.

I agree with the claim that many important discoveries and creations are accidental arising from a quest focused on one ~~inquire~~ ^{inquire} that unexpectedly leads to another answer.

This phenomenon exemplifies the serendipitous nature of scientific exploration and innovation, emphasizing that the pursuit of knowledge is often not a linear path but rather a maze of unexpected findings.

One of the most prominent examples is the discovery of penicillin by ~~the~~ Alexander Fleming. While studying the properties of staphylococci, Fleming noticed that contaminating his petri dishes was killing the surrounding bacteria. This accident led to the development of ~~best~~ penicillin, one of the most revolutionary antibiotics in history. Without this unintentional observation, countless lives would have been lost due to bacterial infections.

Similarly, the invention of the microwave oven by Percy Spencer. Exemplifies how unintentional discoveries can ~~transform~~ transform industries.

While origin on radar technology during world war II, Spencer noticed that a chocolate bar melted in his pocket due to the microwave radiation. This serendipitous moment led the creation of the microwave oven, which have since become a staple appliance in modern kitchens. Detractors might argue that purposeful research or methodical experimentation yield more significant breakthroughs.

While is this true for some discoveries, the ability embrace the unexpected can often lead to even more profound insights.

The history of science is a field with examples where curiosity and a chance have intertwined, illustrating that the path to understanding is frequently paved with unforeseen results.

In conclusion, the accidental nature of numerous important discoveries highlights the importance of remaining open to unexpected findings. Such serendipity in science not only broadens other knowledge but also propels humanity toward innovative solutions and advancements. ~~Thus~~, ~~I~~

In the end, I firmly support that claim that many crucial discoveries arise from accident.

In conclusion, requiring parental volunteerism not only boosts students' success but also strengthens the fabric of the school community. Schools should actively encourage and facilitate this involvement as a vital strategy for educational improvement.

I strongly agree that all parents should be required to volunteer time for their children's schools. Parents' involvement is a critical component of a child's educational success and mandating volunteer time can significantly enhance the school community, improve student performance, and foster stronger relationships between families and educators.

First and foremost, parental involvement has been consistently linked to improved ~~academic~~ ~~outcomes~~ academic outcomes for children. When parents ~~engage~~ engage with their children's education - by volunteering at the school, helping with homework, or attending events - they ~~send~~ send a powerful message about the importance of education. For example, studies have shown that students whose parents are actively involved in their education tend to have higher grades and test scores, better attendance records, and increased motivation to succeed.

Moreover, requiring volunteer time can help create a stronger school community. Schools thrive when parents actively participate in PTA meetings, organize fundraising events, or help with classroom activities. Such engagement fosters a sense of belonging and builds a collaborative environment where teachers, parents, and students work together toward common goals. This ~~strong~~ interconnectedness can lead to a more supportive and enriching educational experience for all students.

Some may argue that not all parents have the time or resources to volunteer, making such a requirement inequitable. However, schools can implement flexible volunteering options, such as remote participation or short-term commitments, to accommodate varying schedules and circumstances. Additionally, schools can offer different forms of involvement, allowing parents to contribute in ways that fit their abilities - whether it be

I was asked whether I agree or not with the statement that if a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable.

I wholeheartedly disagree. I personally do not believe that a person should excuse their actions with a worthy cause.

Of course, said cause is not always a bad one. For instance, if a student skipped their first lesson in school (or simply ~~was~~ were late to their class) because they helped an elder cross the road, or had to help their younger sibling get to school or any other place. First... can one really say it's not amenable?

Although, with how the suggested sentence is formed, is it really safe to assume it is only about goals and ways of achieving those goals deemed by society as morally acceptable? This could well be said by a criminal, since some goals may be considered worthy to some people, while to others they could be alien or generally immoral.

An example: a single mother that is struggling financially, stole a sum of money from her co-worker. Was the goal, take money to be able to feed herself and her childer, worthy?

Goings back to my earlier statement, a person should not excuse their actions with a goal they deemed worthy enough to do what they had done. Any goal may become worthy if you twist it enough, let alone if you do not mention your way of getting to it. In any situation, the goal should not be used as an excuse, but rather as the reason.

Nowadays many students are wondering which field of study they should choose, but the real question is what they should base their choice on. There are a lot of options, for example, you may choose your field based on the future salary or respectability of the profession. I will argue that the choice should be made in relation to the availability of jobs in that field.

Firstly, a person chooses their university in order to get a job in their field of study, so there is no point in studying for a job you won't be likely to get. It is better to choose an university based on availability of a jobs than to have no opportunity to get a job after graduating and to have to think about what you would do next. Secondly, almost ^a person has must have money if they want to live comfortably, and in order to make money you should find a job after graduating. If you don't get a job, you may face problems with paying for food and a place you live in.

However, many would argue that a student ^{should} choose their field according to the heart, but there are many fields with available jobs that are likely to find a place in a student's heart. Others would also say you should choose a field based on a future salary, but there would be no use to a high salary if you are unable to get a job.

All in all, the best criteria for choosing a field of study is the availability of jobs. A student would be able to find a job immediately after graduating and support themselves if jobs in their field are available.

There is a quite common belief that if a goal is worthy, then any means taken to obtain it are justifiable. However, despite the fact some cases may prove this saying right, I strongly disagree with the claim. To back my stake up, I am going to operate ^{with} my literature knowledge.

This philosophical statement has been mused over throughout centuries. One of the earliest existential thinkers, well-known Russian ~~and~~ author F.M. Dostoevsky, figured the answer out. He was sure that not a single drop of tears by any measure (especially childish) works the goal. ~~The beginning of~~ Such an idea was seen in his ^{novel} "Crime and Punishment" (where the main character put himself above the law and was ^{morally} punished for it, and reached its culmination in "Karamazov Brothers" (in obedience of Ivan Karamazov). ^{therefore,} "Life is the most important and precious g.^t a human can be ^{presented with} ~~granted~~, so even "small evil" can not justify any means taken to achieve "great purposes" (which one viewed as arrogance and pride). ^{and valued as his} ^{independently} ^{absent}

Other Russian writer, but of social-^{philosophical} democratic beliefs, M. Berkov, who created his concept of a person whose goals are worthy of any means. It does not matter whether his purpose is the revolution or a way out of the moral and social bottom. Later, however, ^{body} he regretted his ^{early} romantic decisions, ^{seeing what} they resulted into. How can an ordinary person ^{think} be so huge ^{common} of themselves when even such figures of world heritage doubt their opinions? One ~~can~~ is not able to foresee the future of their actions, which means sacrifice can not be accepted to quench one's curiosity nor ego.

In conclusion, I'd like to sum up all the abovementioned things. ~~Not a~~ There is no goal that ~~is worthy~~ justifies means taken to attain it. Human's nature is dark and can lead to horrible consequences.

Almost all people want to achieve some goals during their lives. However, some aims are so difficult to fulfill that people have to use all means they can to reach their goals including cruel ones. In my opinion, if a goal is worthy, then any means to attain it are justifiable. I have ^{two} several reasons to support my point of view.

Firstly, there are some aims that are ~~desirable~~ ~~crucial to reach~~ for the whole nations want to fulfill. Such goals ^{can be} ~~are~~ very important for the whole world as they usually include maintaining peace or saving a lot of human lives. For example, during the World War II ~~the USSR~~ there were some groups of people in the army of the USSR who shot ^{Soviet} soldiers who tried to escape from the battle field. Undoubtedly, it is awful when people kill soldiers from the same army kill each other. Nevertheless, this way of treating soldiers worked and they stopped ^{leaving} ~~to leave~~ the battle fields. As a result, the USSR won the War, which became possible only because of cruel methods which were used ^{of} to organising the Soviet army. I believe that the Victory in the World War II ~~was~~ worth all ways to make

~~soldiers fight.~~

Secondly, every person wants to make the best out of any situation. Unfortunately, people have unlimited needs while natural resources are limited. As a consequence, humans have to compete to get some resources and satisfy their needs. ~~The best competitor wins this competition~~ allows people to develop their skills and ~~to~~ make progress. That is why, it is good when people compete even if some of their methods are bad. ~~For example, when Germany declared war on the USSR, it during the World War II the USSR and Germany fought for different resources like the land ^{and} forests, and other~~ It can be seen

For example, ~~The fact that the USSR killed German soldiers during the World War II~~ can be seen as a cruel method of competition. However, this allowed the USSR to develop different machines and make ~~relax~~ people ~~from the USSR~~ more stronger ~~ma~~ mentally. What is more, fighting against Germany made it possible for the USSR to save and use its natural resources.

To sum up, ~~people can have different goals and use different methods to attain them~~ I believe that only good goals are definitely worth ~~it~~ and I am sure that any means ^{taken} to achieve such goals are ~~is~~ justifiable.

As some people strongly believe, if a goal is worthy, then any means taken to attain it are justifiable. Actually, this phrase is originated to Julius Caesar. I personally don't agree with this position: as to my point of view, despite some ~~purposes~~^{ur} being really great and important for whole the humanity, there are ways to achieve them that may go too far and even be immoral. To ~~the~~ support my opinion, I would like to give ~~an~~ some examples from literature.

In Yevgeniy Zamyatin's novel, "We" society seems to exist happily in place and order. But turning to details, it occurs, that people's ~~some~~ personalities are taken away, as well as even their souls. Each person or "number", as they are called by the author, is just like the number he is given. ~~Also~~ Also worth mentioning is the fact that in attempts to create the "perfect world" only 0,1% of whole the humanity survived. I think that such means are unjustifiable and unacceptable, and Yevgeniy Zamyatin seems to agree with me

Another point to support of my position may be found in ^{the} novel "Demons" by great Russian writer Fedor Dostoevsky. One of it's side characters, Shigalev, a member of secret revolutionary society, created a plan of rebuilding the world, according to which the society had to be democratic at first, but then turned to complete tyranny. For example, 90% of humans population should have been enslaved, taken aback of any resistance and put under the rule of 10% left, that ~~for~~ would have exclusive access to knowledge, education and civil laws. Despite this fact, whole the humanity had to live happily due to decades of special upbringing. However, I find such means immoral and unacceptable, and Dostoevsky seems to agree, as he is laughing at Shigalev's plan in his novel.

In conclusion, there are some immoral and inhumanous means to attain some aims, that are for sure unacceptable and unexcusable, no matter how great the purpose is.

~~The problem of justifying~~ The moral dilemma about whether you can stop at nothing to achieve the desired result ~~was a~~ is a well-known and discussed problem in the philosophical field. Even today it remains a vibrant field for debates.

In my opinion, if the goal, that you or an individual or a group of individuals will benefit the strive for, will benefit society, then there's nothing wrong with using all the means. Humanists and moralists might say that this is cruel and utterly wrong, but every great accomplice has its cost.

~~For example, industrialisation of the Soviet Union in 1930s. Many liberal and right-leaning historians criticize~~

For example, the Chechen war. When the newly-founded Russian ~~R~~ army started an anti-terrorist counteroffensive to liquidate separatists and enforce law on this territory, Russian soldiers were met with criticism from liberal pro-western media for their harsh methods. The goal was to stop human-trafficking ^{and} genocide of Russians, that lived in Chechen Republic. If ~~the~~ people are in a situation like this, there's nothing morally wrong with stopping at nothing.

Another example is war in Vietnam. ~~It~~ It is widely known that Vietnam soldiers used a variety of traps, ~~when~~ an american soldier got into one of them, he would ~~not~~ have had his joints crippled or even may died. When american soldiers became POW's, they were ^{sometimes} tortured or held in harsh conditions. North Vietnam communists committed bombings and terrorist attacks. This all was to maintain independence of Vietnam and make ^{the} USA withdraw their troops.

Some might say that those arguments are ideologically ideological. However, both Vietkong and Russian Army, presented in examples, were fighting not for some margin and money, but for morally right causes, that may be deemed rightful by all adequate people on the political spectre.

To sum it up, for the goal to be justified it must be something that falls in the category of high morale, like saving people or fighting for independence from imperialists.

Do you have a goal in your life? Probably, the answer is "yes". Someone desires to become rich, someone - to make a life-changing observation, someone - to climb to the top of a career ladder. Everybody chooses different ways to fulfill their dreams. From my point of view, the goal ^{itself} does not make any steps people take towards achieving their aim justified, and I would like to prepare some arguments to support my position.

First of all, everyone has a choice how to achieve their goals. Imagine, if people would stop taking responsibility for their actions and thinking about others because they believe that their goal is worth everything. Our world will become chaotic! People's lives and their well-being are the most important values nowadays, and we must remember it to stay humans. For example, one might deceive their employees to have a better job or a higher salary. It will definitely lead to a situation where honest people will lose their ^{jobs} places and sources of income and won't be able to support themselves or their families financially. ~~Do~~ ^{Are} the person's actions worth the price other people will have to pay? Personally, I do not think so.

Furthermore, no one can't be in charge of saying which goal ~~is~~ worth any means to attain it and which one doesn't. Another vivid example ^{of how the goal can't justify person's actions} is Raskolnikov from "The Crime and the Punishment". A ^{the} young man committed a crime. He killed an old lady because he wanted to prove his theory. His aim was not motivated by great and kind motifs which ^{had} led to the awful consequences.

To conclude, sometimes it is really desirable to use everything in your power to achieve your goal or a dream, but it is important to remember about humility and kindness and take responsibility for your actions. Anything you do affect other people's lives, too.

I disagree with the statement that university students should base their choice of field of study on the availability of jobs in that field. Of course, availability of jobs in the sector is an important factor, when choosing a job, but it definitely shouldn't be the main factor.

I think that the ultimate factor when it comes to finding a job is whether you like it or not, whether the job brings you happiness or discontent. For instance, let's imagine a situation where a man, let's name him Bob, picks a job that's highly available, but doesn't bring him pleasure. Sure, it will be easy for Bob to find a work ~~place~~ place and start working right away. But what point would there be in getting the job quickly if he doesn't like it anyway? We are left with an employed, but unsatisfied Bob, whose life is sad, maybe even miserable. Now let's imagine a situation where Bob picks a less, maybe even much less ~~at~~ available job, but one that brings him happiness. Sure, Bob might not find a job right away. But he won't stop - he is driven by his desire to get a job that he likes. And, sooner or later, I'm sure Bob will find an opportunity. What are we left with? ~~But~~ An employed and happy Bob, who enjoys going to work each day, and thus not only is happier himself, but also is much more productive at work, bringing him more income.

Bob was obviously just a silly example. A person looking for a ~~job~~ low-availability job that they like ~~is~~ is sure to face many struggles and hardships. But I'm sure that if they love a specific discipline enough, they will find a job, no matter the ~~obstacles~~ obstacles they face.

~~There's an opinion that all parents should be required to volunteer time to their children's schools.~~

~~First of all, I must say that I disagree with the given claim. Besides, I do think that said requirement isn't necessary nor beneficial neither to children or their parents.~~

There's an opinion that all parents should be required to volunteer time to their children's schools. First of all, I must say that I disagree with the given claim. Besides, I do not think that said requirement is necessary or beneficial either to children or their parents.

To support my point of view, I would like to give the following examples, reasons. To begin with, most parents are busy working for more hours a day to provide their children with food, clothes and other necessities. So, they simply don't have enough time to participate in school activities. Well, it is not true to everybody as there are active parents who are willing to volunteer anyway, but it still would be wrong to make every parent do that without any exception. Secondly, requiring parents to volunteer at schools can be truly distracting for pupils. The reason for this is that almost every child wants to go and see his or her parent if there's a possibility to do so. As a result, they don't focus on their studies and lessons because everything they think about is their mom or dad being somewhere at school. In addition, I would like to point out that it would be wise for school administration to contact people who are already volunteer and do it willingly instead of requiring children's parents to do things they are not supposed to do.

To sum up, I think that the given proposal can be not that appealing as it may seem. There are some disadvantages that can be crucial when trying to make that work.

The decision of what to study at university is an important moment in a young person's life, connected with both excitement and anxiety. While passion and personal interest are often cited as the primary drivers, the argument that university students should base their choice solely on job availability is increasingly persuasive in today's competitive job market. This pragmatic approach, while potentially sacrificing some individual fulfillment, offers significant long-term advantages.

Prioritizing job prospects minimizes the risk of accumulating substantial student debt without a clear path to repayment. A degree in a field with limited job opportunities can leave graduates saddled with loans and facing unemployment, a situation that can hinder future financial stability and overall well-being. Focusing on in-demand fields, such as engineering, technology, healthcare or certain business sectors, increases the likelihood of securing gainful employment upon graduation, allowing graduates to begin repaying debts and building their careers.

Furthermore, a career path with strong job security provides a greater sense of stability and reduces the stress associated with constant job searching. This stability can be particularly beneficial for individuals planning long-term financial goals, such as buying a home or starting a family. Knowing that their chosen field offers numerous opportunities fosters confidence and allows graduates to focus on professional development and advancement rather than the perpetual worry of job security.

However, this solely utilitarian approach is not without its drawbacks. Choosing a field

Concluding, I would like to say that there are a lot of things to think about when ~~the~~ you choose your future career. You can choose by your soul or by your brain. But you should always know that ^{is} your job should make you happy. This is the best way to choose your study field.

In our modern world universities provide a vast choice of professions. Students can choose any field of study, but after getting their diploma they may face a depressing reality where some jobs are much more needed than the others. A lot of people find it unfair and complain that they paid their tuition for nothing, as their diploma can't provide them with job.

In my personal opinion, university students should base their choice of a field of study on the availability of jobs in that field. I think that any person should shape their future accordingly to the real life, and it is completely normal that our society's need for different occupations is imbalanced. By choosing a field of study you are also choosing your career path.

Moreover, our world is becoming more and more interconnected, which means that there are now and will be completely new ~~professions~~ professions which often combine elements of several fields of study. It means that even if you don't think your field of study would guarantee you a stable job, there is still a chance that it may merge with something else and create a new job, which will be much needed and will bring you joy.

To sum up, the choice of a field of study is also a choice of student's career path and his financial stability. Those reasons are, in my opinion, why students should base their choice on the availability of jobs.

I believe, that the statement "If a goal is worthy, then any means taken to ~~achieve~~ attain it are justifiable" is incorrect. Some goals can be considered extremely important, whether it is by a single man, an entire nation or the whole world. But I believe, that regardless of how important a goal may seem, there are some lines simply not meant to be crossed.

For example: people following the noble cause financially helping out their loved ones should not resort to heavy crime and people opposing a political regime should not resort to bloodshed. Both of the stated goals are, without doubt considered worthy by the people trying to achieve them, but some means of attaining these goals may bring great suffering to other people.

Some people may claim, that there are goals so worthy, that anything done to achieve them is just. One of the most most worthy goals I ~~can~~ think of it would be ending World War II. That is the goal, that the United States military was trying to achieve during the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. This bombing had resulted in a colossal amount of deaths, injuries, broken homes and broken families. The Japanese shortly capitulated, marking the end of World War II. One of the most worthy goals had been achieved, but I can't say, that the means to achieve it were just. Japan would most likely surrender without the bombing, but doing anything possible to achieve the goal took the lives of innocent people.

~~I do~~ I believe, that people ~~should~~ should weigh their options and think about whether something is worth doing even if they're following an extremely important goal.
